

AMBROSE and ELEANOR;

0/2807 21

THE ADVENTURES OF

TWO CHILDREN DESERTED

ON AN UNINHABITED ISLAND.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

WITH ALTERATIONS,

Adapting it to the Perusal of Youth, for whose Amusement and Instruction it is defigned.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

The Adventures of the Six Princesses of Babylon; Juvenile Magazine; Vifit for a Week, &c.

Hondon:

PRINTED FOR R. AND L. PEACOCK,

At the Juvenile Library, No. 259, Oxford-Street; and fold by Mestrs. HOOKHAM and CARPENTER, Bond-Street.

1796.

.8P/0PT.ho

'HE defign of the Editor in the prefent free and abridged translation of Faufan er Lolottei was to form a work exprefsly for the penutal of youth ", the native feelings of the heart mandult meted by vice; the docility and indoney a more children, abandoned to themil 1891 1891 the leffons of a for horeting las (4) processor appeal radour albeit to excite the entire the anterestrated attention of youth a but he hany characters and focues weren into the originals could nether afford pleature not advantage avenile reader, in order to fugurels there and at the fame time to prefere the interest

2

a

tl

pi

to te

an ne

ju

an

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE defign of the Editor in the prefent free and abridged translation of Fanfan & Lolotte, was to form a work expressly for the perusal of youth: the native feelings of the heart unadulterated by vice, the docility and industry of two children, abandoned to themselves at an ealry age, the leffons of a watchful and enlightened preceptor, appeared to her fubjects proper to excite the emulation and interest the attention of youth; but as many characters and fcenes woven into the original, could neither afford pleasure nor advantage to a juvenile reader, in order to suppress them, and at the same time to preserve the interest

di

rig.

201

tent

DES.

TIE!

mys.

s bus

to make confiderable alterations: for these she can offer no other apology than the necessity, which must be obvious to every reader acquainted with the French Work. She has endeavoured to preserve the interest and to imitate the simplicity of the original; if she has failed in these points, she has only the satisfaction to reslect, that the Work, in its present state, may with safety be submitted to the perusal of the class of Readers for which it is designed.

on the same and the same of trologico de vener en da la filma y lo mentros blace tonicine and other never concertives e of the community of a societal of incillate incident

Suvenile render, in order to charge them, mergerial to a refer to to controlled the book

AMBROSE

le

re

I

of

Be

ho

hir

del

the

app

Th

a di

2

AMBROSE AND ELEANOR.

A Clear sky, and prosperous gales, announced a happy voyage to the vessel in which Colonel Carlton had embarked for England: it was returning from Jamaica; leaving on the left the Isle of Cuba, and on the right the superb forests of the ancient Bayti*. The pilot steered toward the Bermuda Isles; and the Colonel in a few weeks hoped to embrace a wife and child, endeared to him by an absence of twelve months; but these delightful prospects soon vanished; the rolling of the vessel encreased, a tremendous water-spout approached, and threatened instant destruction. This being, by the advice of the pilot, broken by a discharge of cannon, all that remained to be done

B

ROSE

-

y

k.

est

gi-

The

hat

vith

the

d.

St. Domingo, so called before the invasion of the Spa-done was to lower the fails, shut the hatches, and abandon the vessel to the mercy of the waves. The Heavens were soon filled with slashes of lightning; thick darkness succeeded day; the thunder rolled, and the vessel, the sport of all the various revolutions of the boisterous waves, presented only to the unfortunate passengers shipwreck or death: this soon followed, for the point of a rock forcing an entrance into the vessel, in a few minutes, precipitated it into the bosom of the vast ocean. In this moment of danger, the Colonel, ever calm and collected, seized a plank, upon which he committed himself to the waves: his example was followed by a few others, and by his faithful domestic Peter.

Having long floated at random, and contended with the fury of the waves, the Colonel found himself near land; but such was the violence of the sea, that at the moment his hopes were strongest, he was frequently carried by an overwhelming wave to the greatest distance: at length, after various efforts, he gained a coast covered with rocks,

over

fi

ti

h kı

O

ed

gli

tak

COL

not per

feei

hau

lunt

wea

dren

imm

4

es,

es.

ht-

der

ous

nly

th:

cing

ites,

ean.

ever

which

mple

ithful

ended

found

nce of

drong-

elming

fter va-

rocks,

over

1

over which he with difficulty climbed to an extenfive plain, where he funk down, wholly deprived of sensation. In this state he remained nearly two hours, when his senses by degrees returning, he discovered two children, half-naked, on their knees, at his side, who, by their innocent gestures, expressed the most lively interest in his situation.
One of them perceiving that he breathed, exclaimed, in a jargon he could just distinguish to be English, "He is not dead, sister; he is come to take us home—are you not father?"

His first questions were, "Where am I? What country do you inhabit?" But finding that he was not clearly understood, he looked round for some person to whom he might address himself. Not seeing any one, he attempted to rise; but exhausted with fatigue, sunk down, uttering involuntary sighs and groans, forced from him by the weakness of his condition.

"He is hungry, brother," faid one of the children, "I will go and fetch him some food;" and immediately she fled across the plain.

« Who

"Who do you belong to?" faid the Colonel, recovering himself, "have you no friends? no father, no mother?"

- "Are not you our father?" asked the boy.
- "I! my child," faid the Colonel, "I do not know you."
  - "Will you not then love us?" faid the child.
  - "Yes; but are you alone?"
- "O yes," returned he, "we are all alone; nobody but Eleanor and Ambrose; we see only the great beasts, and they frighten us very much."
- "And who brought you into this country, Ambrofe," faid the Colonel.
- "A great house," replied the child, "that went
- "And have you never seen one like it touch
- "O never," faid the child; "there are only great men, all black, that come fometimes in little boats. When we see them we hide ourselves for fear they should eat us."
  - "Well!" faid the Colonel with a figh, "I am

the

y

h

A

to da

to

tre

the

his

a-n

cei

fo c

an a thin

then lost without resource! I must end my days here, far from my wife, my friends, my country."

- "You will stay with us, will you not?" faid the boy.
  - " Alas, my child! I have no choice."
- "Oh," returned he, "we will love and caress you, as we used to do Derley."
  - " Derley! who was he?"
- "Our good friend," answered the child; "but he is dead; we have wept a great deal for him." As he said this, his sister returned with some tortoise and colibri eggs; she brought also some dates and a large shell filled with a liquor, which to the taste seemed that which slows from the palm tree. This simple repast proved very salutary to the Colonel; his strength returned, he thanked his little hosts for their solicitude, and restecting a-new upon his adventure was assonished to conceive it possible that two children, so young and so delicate, should provide for all their wants at an age when others scarcely know how to walk or think: he wished to discover by what means it only

hild.

not

uch."

, Am-

t went touch

imes in ourselves

, "I am

the

had been effected, but they expressed their ideas very imperfectly; he could only guess at their little jargon, and judge from it that they were He resolved, nevertheless, while he awaited the return of day, to interrogate them, that he might, from their answers, form some conjectures upon their condition, and the cause of their being deserted at so early an age. "How old are you?" faid he. "We do not understand you," replied Ambrose; but when he repeated, " I ask how many times you have seen the cold and hot feafons?" Eleanor faid, "We cannot tell; but fince the time our good friend died, we have at every fun made a mark with a stone on that great tree you fee there." The Colonel admired the ingenious expedient the children had employed, and going toward the tree, by the light of the moon added all the marks, and counted 1528, which made four years two months and eight days fince they had loft Derley. "But," faid he, "did he die as foon as you came here?"

that yety much hand their we faw han no m is-

"0

h

t

g

th

US

W

(fe fh

fin

for

Co

cri

"O yes," replied the children, "his blood, flowed like the spring at which we drink,"

" He was wounded then?" faid the Colonel.

" Very much," they replied.

"But," faid the Colonel, "who brought you hither in the wooden house?"

"Mama, with a great many men; one of them was a very bad man; he beat Derley, and gave him a great many cuts with a knife, and then put him with us into a little boat that brought us here."

"And do you," faid the Colonel, "recollect where you lived before you went into this ship? (for the wooden house you speak of is called a ship)."

"Yes, in great houses, where there were many fine things; then we used to see our dear father sometimes, and he used to kiss and love us."

"And was your father in the ship?" said the Colonel.

"No; before we went into it, he and mama cried very much; and then we faw him no more."

deas

heir

vere

he

iem,

ome

fe of How

fland

ated,

cold

annot

d, we

ne on

el ad-

n had

e light

ounted

hs and

But,"

iere?"

"In what place," faid the Colonel, "was the great house in which you lived?"

"In a place where there were a great many others," replied Ambrose. "Do you remember, sister, that a woman used to carry us often into a sine garden, where there was a great river, and roads of trees, where fine women and men used to walk, while we played upon the grass with little girls and boys?"

"Yes," faid Eleanor, "I remember it very well."

From these answers the Colonel could draw little information; all that he conjectured was that his little hosts were the victims of some fort of treachery, and that Derley was their friend; and he thought it possible that the fine garden of which they spoke might be St. James's Park; but all this was not sufficiently clear; he hoped that time, by strengthening their reason, would afford him a more satisfactory explanation.

No sooner had the morning sun inslamed the horizon, than he arose, and taking the young pupils

e li

e

ir

th

di

W

on

on

ho

of all

fuc

fan

the

and

any oer, to a and used little very draw of and it and

den of k; but

ned the ing pu-

afford

pils of Nature, who were henceforth to be his own, by the hand, fet out to take a view of the land which Providence had destined, for some time at least, to be his abode. He discovered that it was an ifland, furrounded by steep rocks, and acceffible only on one fide to veffels; it was not very extensive, but was covered with mountains, woods, little hills, and cool and fragrant valleys; here an embowering forest invited the traveller to taste in its religious inclosure the sweets of solitude: there a mountain flowly rifing, covered with fern, discovered from its top an extensive ocean, strewed with an infinity of little islands, which appeared only like the points of fo many rocks. Farther on a spring of water escaped trembling from the hollow of a cave, and ran meandering over beds of reeds to water a smiling plain, enamelled with all the various beauties of vegetation. A thousand fucculent vegetables and blooming flowers, a thoufand fruits and odoriferous trees, contended for the shade and land; the cocoa, the casia, the palm and the banana tree, the leaves of which were, according B 5

according to the Indians, the veftments of our first parents; the fig, the white cotton tree, in a word, all the most curious and useful productions of America. No traces of men were, however, visible, but those of different animals, such as otters, stags, goats, and the anta, a small animal which resembles the elephant, though much smaller, and is common to Peru. Among the birds was the fou, a little inossensive fowl, which has the habit of clinging to the masts of vessels; the Edolio, so called from its repeating, without ceasing, in a low melancholy tone, edolio; and the Foken, a bird of an exquisite slavour.

"Well," faid Ambrose, having led the Colonel over the island, "do you find all this so frightful? Eleanor and I sleep when it is no longer light, and when the sun shines, we run into the woods to seek food. We throw stones at the high trees, and the fruits fall, and we eat them."

"But you had not always strength to do so," faid the Colonel.

"No," replied Eleanor, "it is only fince the

dry

a

P

ir

fti

bι

at

CO

an

ing

* i

fhe

" in

dry weather that Ambrose thought of it. O me! before we were not tall enough, and we only eat the fruits that the trees let fall, or some eggs that the great fish brought to the fide of the water: but we are near our cabin; come in, father, you shall fee it; take care you do not hurt your head." It was a kind of fubterraneous cave, at which they arrived through a deep valley, overgrown with palm-trees. The Colonel readily entered; but was instantly alarmed by a foetid smell, that nearly stifled him: he advanced to discover the cause; but what was his horror and aftonishment, when, at the further part of the cave, he faw a disfigured corpse! it was partly dry, and partly putrified, and was covered with different aromatic leaves. "Do not be frightened," faid Eleanor, observing the impression it made upon the Colonel, " it is he!"

"He! my child, who?" "Poor Derley," fhe replied, "who fell dead in this corner."—
"And have you, my children," faid the Colonel, "inhabited a cavern where—" "Oh, we never

B 6

left

dry

fR

rd.

of

vi-

25 mal

nal-

irds

has

the

ceaf-

l the

Colo-

right-

onger

o the

at the em."

o fo,"

left it," interrupted Eleanor, "that we might be always with him." "Yes," faid Ambrofe, "we look at him every fun, and cover him with fresh leaves." "Good creatures!" exclaimed the Colonel; "but, my little friends, he can no longer hear you." "Oh! we know very well," faid Ambrofe, "that he cannot hear us; for if he could, he would speak to us, but we would not part with him for all that." "But, my dear children," faid the Colonel, "you expose yourselves to the danger of becoming sick, and dying likewise."

"Ah," faid Ambrose, having remained thoughtsul a moment, "once as we were looking at Derley, Eleanor's face turned quite white, and she sell upon the ground. I thought she was going to die; for I called, and she did not answer me; Eleanor I said, my dear Eleanor, will you leave Ambrose all alone? but she did not speak. Then I turned to the Sun, and begged he would give me back Eleanor, or burn me with his fire. He heard me, for she got up and walked.

No

3

h

C

0

in

lo

ha

die

ho

ar

un

CX

fior

Dis

mai

"Not the Sun, my child," faid the Colonel, but God heard you."

"God! who is God?" "That Great Being, my child," faid the Colonel, "who has placed you upon the earth; who watches over you, who has miraculously preserved your life: but I shall explain this hereafter, at present we must think of taking hence this inanimate corpse."

"Oh, no," exclaimed the children at the fame instant. "Suffer me to remove it," faid the Colonel, "I know where God would have it put."

"Pray, pray," faid Eleanor, holding her little hands toward him, "do not take it away: we shall die if we do not see poor Derley."

By dint of argument and entreaty, the Colonel, however, at length prevailed; he drew from them a reluctant confent, and drawing the corpfe of the unfortunate Derley from the cavern, he began to examine it, hoping to form from it some conclusions relative to the fate of the two little strangers. Disfigured as it was, it appeared to be that of a man about thirty years of age, tall and well made:

be

we

all

Co-

ger

faid

he

not

chil-

elves

like-

ught-

Der-

d she

ing to me;

leave

Then

ive me

. He

his cloaths, upon being touched, fell into rags; but the Colonel picked up a watch, fet with diamonds, and a gold fnuff-box, in the infide of which was fet the portrait of a woman: the damp had almost wholly defaced it, but it was easy to diftinguish that the principal features were handfome. The box, he observed also, had a double bottom, in which he found a letter, which he opened precipitately, but it was fo macerated, that, among others entirely defaced, he could only diftinguish the following words-

London.

	dren
"Dep-
four years thatunion, this	-the er firstto God
in Piccadilly, at twelve	1

Finding nothing more upon the corpfe, excepting some guineas, a knife, sciffars, and a pocket-book abfolutely in afhes, he refolved to inter

in w

fe

W fo

46 hi

pr

C

hir

Co

cer

my thi

a b the

dug

5;

a-

of

np

to

nd-

ble

he

ed,

nly

ren

the

ex-

da

l to

nter

inter it. "But," faid he to the children, who, with eyes bathed in tears, and fixed upon Derley, feemed buried in the most profound apathy, "how was it that you did not touch the jewels your unfortunate friend possessed." "Oh," they replied, "we loved him too much to take any thing from him, and then we did not know he had all these pretty things."

"You have never then fearched him?" faid the Colonel."

"Never," faid Ambrose, "we only looked at him and then wept."

"What respectful tenderness!" exclaimed the Colonel. His thoughts then reverted to the interment of the corpse. He had observed in an adjacent vale, a little mount which rose covered with myrrh trees, and overshaded by four palms. To this spot he immediately repaired, and having with a branch of the Bischalo, the hard wood of which the negroes use for the construction of their cabins, dug a grave, he deposited in it the remains of the unfortunate Derley, while his two little friends beheld the mournful ceremony bathed in tears.

the

He then struck fire from a neighbouring rock, a wonder which much surprised the children, and burnt upon the grave the clothes of the deceased, adding a quantity of mint, cloves, and other fragrant herbs that grew near, to purify the air. Ambrose and Eleanor could not depart without casting many a lingering glance toward a spot which contained in their eyes an inestimable treasure. They walked—stopped—walked—and would again retrace the same steps to bid an eternal sarewell to their good friend.

West, and the sea, as they ascended the valley, reflecting his crimson rays, appeared a vast plain of fire. Arriving on the shore, the Colonel stopped to admire the glories of the scene, and the children, forgetting their grief, walked hand in hand toward the rocks, and amused themselves with collecting shells and sea-weeds. For some minutes the Colonel lost sight of them, but Eleanor her whi it, ] afra rock ami vere retu ing fom mist men ly a difco bran vera treaf and child

tient

one

k,
nd
ed,
ner
ir.
out

ea-

uld

re-

ds

the re-

elves ome Cleanor

d in

nor foon returned out of breath, to tell him that her brother and she had discovered a great thing which they believed to be a fish. "Come and fee. it, Father," faid she; " it is dead, so do not be afraid." Saying this, she led him among the rocks, where they found Ambrose attentively examining fomething which the Colonel foon difcovered to be a large bundle of hammocks which the returning tide had driven on shore. This suggesting to him the idea of recovering from the wreck fome articles that might foften the feverity of his misfortune, an idea which had not till this moment occurred to him, he began to fearch diligently among the rocks, and with inexpressible joy, discovered two large chests, three small casks of brandy, and some tubs of falt provision, besides several copper utenfils and other articles. Thefe. treasures were by degrees conveyed from the rocks, and deposited in a subterraneous cave which the children pointed out. The Colonel, then impatient to examine the contents of the chefts, forced one of them open, and found in it feveral fuits of clothes, clothes, a quantity of shirts, stockings, handkerchiefs, and some gold and jewels. The other, which was the carpenter's chest, contained a variety of different tools, and was considered by the Colonel as a greater treasure than all the rest.

The fatigues of the day at length rendering rest and refreshment necessary, he kindled a fire, and roasted some pieces of salt meat. Then seating himself with his young companions on the sea beech, he shared with them a meal of which hunger made the chief dainty: and he was not a little diverted to see them, with sparkling eyes, palate the slavour of meats, the relish of which they had long lost, and tenderly incite each other to partake of a feast which to them appeared delicious.

"You do not eat, brother," faid Eleanor; "nor you, fifter," returned Ambrose; and then they both fell greedily upon their meats, which presently disappeared. Their good friend smiled; and congratulated himself upon the power of contributing to their happiness. The repast being ended, they all three repaired to the cavern where Ambrose and

Eleanor

fri lor cou ped mo

foli to r

to l wh

The ed h

his I

of the

into his li

fible

nble

erner, riethe

reft and ting fea hunlittle alate y had se nor both ly difongraing to hey all rtake

se and leanor Eleanor foon fell afleep. It was not fo with their friend: a thousand painful reflections kept him long from tafting the same refreshment. He could not forbear contrasting his situation and profpects the preceding day with those of the present moment. What a change had a few hours wrought! Flushed with hope he was returning to his country to enjoy, with a wife and child whom he tenderly loved, all the conveniencies and the elegancies of life. He now faw himfelf the solitary inhabitant of an unfrequented tract, obliged to renounce his wife, his friends, ati he held dear. These reflections, in spite of his fortitude, bedewed his cheek with tears; but when he called to mind the dangers from which he had escaped, that his life, among numbers the waves had fwallowed, had been preserved, he acknowledged the goodness of the Being who had protected him, and with chearfulness and refignation committed his fate into his hands. His thoughts then turned upon his little companions in whose fate it was impoffible not to be interested, abandoned to themselves on an uninhabited island at the early age of three years and a half; for the marks upon the great tree forming four years two months and eight days, the whole amounted to no more than feven years, two months, and eight days. Their prefervation, he thought, could have been affected by little less than a miracle, and viewing them as the objects fignally pointed at by Providence in his shipwreck, he resolved henceforth to be to them a father? guide, and friend.

The rifing fun awoke him from a short repose, and he looked round to falute his fellow citizens; but he was surprised to find that they had left the cave: at first he concluded they would soon return, but an hour nearly elapfing, he grew alarmed, and having fought them without fuccess in the cave they had formerly inhabited, he repaired to the fea shore which he traversed in the utmost anxiety, calling them repeatedly by name. He knew not what to think, and began to form a thousand horrid conjectures concerning wild beafts, that for any thing he knew to the contrary, might inhabit the island,

m T CO

iff

ha Co

the

hir my

the

dif cor

you not pin

faic cef

W

cur

ree

ree

ys,

ars,

on,

less

ecls

eck,

her?

ofe,

ens;

t the

turn,

, and

cave

o the

ciety,

w not hor-

or any

it the

fland,

island, when the idea occurred to him that they might be at the place where Derley was interred. To this spot their affectionate hearts had in truth conducted them; he met them returning through the wood, their eyes still wet with the tears they had shed upon the grave of their friend. The Colonel chid them gently for the alarm they caused him, and taking them by the hand, "I am pleased my little friends," said he, as they walked through the wood, "with the gratitude and affection you discover toward your unfortunate good friend; it convinces me that your hearts are good; nevertheless you must cease to regret him; God has, I doubt not, taken him from you to bestow on him a happiness that nothing can interrupt.

"How is that, father?" faid the children, "we do not understand you."

"I will explain it to you, my little friends," faid the Colonel, "I ought to do so, but necessity engages me at present to defer this duty. We cannot inhabit the gloomy cave we now occupy; we must endeavour to construct a more agreeable agreable retreat; a cabin that will shelter us from the injuries of the air, and ferve us as an afylum against all alarms. The children were delighted; they jumpt round their good friend, exclaiming in an extacy, "We will help you, father! we will help you!" He resolved, however, before he began his operations, to visit the rocks, judging that the influx of the tide might, during the night, have brought other articles from the wreck on shore. Nor was he deceived; he found a cask of oil, a fecond tub of falt provisions, and a chest containing, besides linen, a variety of books among which were some of the best Latin and English authors. It contained also a case of mathematical instruments, and a fmall mariner's compass. The books were damaged by the wet, but he hoped foon to dry and render them fit for use. Besides, there he found feveral other articles scattered along the shore. of admin 1 2 la

Having secured these new treasures, he turned his thoughts upon the grand work of constructing a cabin. Between two hills that rose near the a f baf
Th
pof
bur
retre boun
the entre
his n
the p wrece
and f eight diftan

fea

the in whole fembli

betwe

mixed rays o

fea

sea coast, was a cool valley, in the midst of which a spring of water, gushing from a rock, formed a basin, bordered with a thousand odoriferous flowers. This valley was shaded by palm-trees, and exposed to the rising sun, was a stranger to the burning heats of noon. It offered an agreeable retreat to the philosopher, and was on one fide bounded by the whole extent of the ocean, and on the other by an embowering forest. Here, at the entrance of the forest, the Colonel resolved to erect his new habitation, and with this design collecting the precious instruments he had taken from the wreck, hewed two of those trees called Bischalos, and shaped four stakes fifteen inches thick, and eight long; these he drove into the earth at the distance of twenty feet from each other, planting between each fix smaller; this done, he filled the intermediate space with flints, cementing the whole with a whitish fort of earth, very much refembling that in Europe called marne, and which mixed with water formed a cement to which the rays of the fun foon gave a hardness equal to stone. He

Aing

m

m

d;

in vill

gan

the

ave

ore.

1, a

ain-

hich

ors.

ftru-

The

oped

fides,

along

urned

er the

fea

He did not forget previously to leave in this little edifice a door, narrow, that he and his companions might the better defend themselves, in case of an attack, against the wild beasts. A large chimney was also formed, and two windows, to establish a current of air necessary in so confined a place occupied by three persons. The lateral parts thus finished, a covering was next to be thought of, and this did not a little puzzle our architect, who having neither tiles nor the tools necessary to faw planks, was embarraffed how to defend his house against the rain and hail, the fize of which is prodigious in North America. At length, calling to mind the manner in which the Africans roof their dwellings, he placed feven or eight joifts horizontally upon the building, and then having raifed others into a point, he formed the whole into a carcafs, with tenons and mortices, and covered it with the leaves of the palm-tree interwoven into 1 fort of mat, in the manner of the negroes on the gold coast: he next made a partition, which separated the interior of the cabin into two parts, and for fee wit bro tab fpoo of a nati hou faid, to de alter purfi and Amb him : went was : carrie (for th agility

their f

formed

ittle ions fan nney blifh e octhus t of, who o faw house s proing to f their rizonraised into a vered it n into a on the

ch sepa-

rts, and

formed

formed for Eleanor a little chamber, about eight feet square, the entrance of which communicated with that which he defigned for himself and Ambrofe. Three stools and a billet, serving for a table, were next produced; also some plates, fpoons, and drinking cups, made with the leaves of a tree called the Balizeir, which are used by the natives of Madagascar for the covering of their houses, and which, if well dried, will remain, it is faid, undecayed five or fix years. It is impossible to describe the zeal and activity of the Colonel; alternately carpenter, mason, tiler, and joiner, he purfued his operations with a degree of vigour and perseverance that removed every obstacle. Ambrofe and Eleanor, on the other hand, affifted him as much as their strength would permit; they went in fearch of the earth of which their cement was formed, moistened it, presented the tools; carried away the chips, gathered the palm leaves (for they climbed the highest trees with the greatest agility) joined them together under the conduct of their friend; in a word, united all their endeavours vours to alleviate his fatigue, and accomplish a work of which they felt, as he did, all the utility. At the end of a month the little edifice was completed, and all that he had gained from the wreck, chests, tools, linen, clothes, &c. conveyed into it: as for beds, he made three very commodious of fome hammocks, spread with mats composed of palm leaves dried in the fun. The chimney concealed his kitchen utenfils, which were hung upon hooks, driven into the wall for that purpose: in short, every thing was complete, and the Colonel and his little friends took possession of their new habitation. The children knew not how to express their joy; they ran, wept, laughed, examined all, and leaping by turns on the neck of their friend, called him repeatedly their father, their dear Carlton, for he had taught them to express his name: then, fuddenly quitting him, they reexamined all, feated themselves twenty times upon the benches, touched, and removed all the furniture, and then returning, again threw themselves into his arms. The Colonel made them, at length, fit the tha app ing troi fped four ter qua duc iflan I de in th perm thip with to pr your as you circu sh a lity. omeck, into us of ed of conupon se: in olonel r new express amined of their r, their express they renes upon fit down, recommended filence, and spoke to them in these terms, "It is time, my children, that I think of the great work to which God has appointed me; that of your education: the forming of your hearts will not, I think, coft me much trouble; they are good and susceptible: with refpect to your intellects, I believe them to be found and comprehensive, but I shall form a better judgment when I am more particularly acquainted with the manner in which you have conducted yourselves since your residence in this island: it is necessary, therefore, Ambrose, before I detail to you my plans, that you recount to me, in the most exact manner that your memory will permit, what you did upon first coming out of the thip that brought you hither, and acquaint me with the means you have employed fince that time to preserve your existence, and to provide for all your wants: arrange your ideas, my child, as well ne furni- as you are able, and do not omit the most trivial emselves circumstance; the detail will be more interesting at length, to me than you may suppose."

nsbeo W

The Colonel ceased, and Ambrose, who during a month had learnt to reflect a little, and to express his ideas in a more intelligent manner, was filent a few minutes to recollect himself, and then gave, without interruption, the following recital.

"We lived, as we told you, father, in a wooden house that went upon the water: we had slept in it a great many times, and every morning Derley used to come and take us up, and carry us to mama, who used to kiss us and cry, and this made us cry too. Once as fhe was kiffing us and crying, a man came into the cabin, and talked a great deal to her: it was that naughty man I told you of: mama cried very much, and would have taken us in her arms, but he took us away from her, and threw us upon the ground. Then Derley was very angry, and seized that naughty man oo, for by the throat, but he drew a very long great knife, While and run it into his belly. Then feveral ugly men oung came in, and put us and Derley into a little boat, by mi that went upon the water much faster than the ome o

W We in

lon

foft

lan

cave

cam

agai

fpok groat

and more

quite

ing he erying

Elean

wooden

durd to mer, and g reooden ept.in Derrry us nd this us and ked a wooden house. Derley groaned very much, and we were all covered with his blood; but the men in the boat laughed, and fet us all three upon this land, father. Then Derley fell down, and lay a long time upon the ground: at last he got up very foftly, and took us by the hand, and walked to the cave, where you know we lived, father, till you came; but as foon as he got in, he fell down again, and dragged us upon him. We cried, and spoke to him, but he did not answer, he only groaned. He groaned all night, and we cried, and when the fun came again, he breathed no more. We took him by the hands, but they were I told quite cold; then we spoke to him again, but findld have ing he did not answer, we went out of the cave, y from crying, and running about upon the fea-shore. en Der-Eleanor soon fell down; I ran to her, and fell: ty man oo, for I felt as if I was going to fall afleep. at knife, While we were fitting, a goat passed by with a gly men oung one fucking: at that moment it came into ttle boat, ny mind to drive away the young one, and fuck than the ome of the milk; fo drawing myself under the wooden goat, goot,

goat, the good creature let me drink as much as I would, without going away, or hurting me. This gave me frength; I got up, and led her to Eleanor, who fucked fome of her milk, fmiled, held out her hand to me, and got up; but the goat was going away, and we were afraid the would not come back to us. "What shall we do?" faid I to Eleanor. "Let us lead her to Derley," fhe replied: fo we took her by the horn, and led her to the cave, the young one following all the way. Still Derley did not speak, so we began again to cry, and call him: "Derley!" we faid, "Derley, speak to us: are you angry? we will do so no more. Answer us, Derley, it is Ambrose, it is Eleanor; do you not love us?" Our uneafiness encreased every instant, we were so happy with mama! and now we were in a frightful cave, all dark! This made us on a fudden thoughtful; we ceased crying, and looked at each other, without fpeaking or stirring at all. In this time we forgot our goat, till feeing she was gone, we run out of the cave to feek her. In our way fomething fell from

fr

us

bi

th

w

fh:

gr

th

wl

aga

ed,

ver

fon

it v dra

gen

wei

tim

mad

ing

till

ley,

as I This ileaheld goat vould " faid " fhe ed her way. gain to Derdo fo rose, it eafiness y with ave, all ful; we without re forgot in out of hing fell

from

from a high tree as we passed it, and frightened us very much: we ran away as fast as we could, but at last venturing to look back, and seeing nothing to alarm us, we returned on tip-toe, to fee what had fallen from the tree, and found a fruit shaped like a very large green pear: I was so hungry, that I could not help tasting it, and found that it was very good: fo I gave it to Eleanor, who eat half, and left me the rest. We then went again in fearch of the goat, but feeing as we passed, a great tree that water came out of it, being very dry, I put my mouth to the tree, and fucked fome. Eleanor did the fame, and we both thought it was much better than the water we had before drank. At last, thinking we should not find the gentle beaft which had given us her milk, we went back to the cave, which we were a long time in finding. The fight of our good friend made us again cry very much, till no longer feeing any light, we fell upon the ground, and flept till a new fun. When we awoke, we kiffed Derley, and being very hungry, ran to the tree at the COURTER C 4 foot foot of which we had found the great pear; but there were no pears; so we run to the seashore, crying, and repeating the prayers mama used to make us say morning and night. "O, Eleanor, do you remember how frightened we were!" There was a great beaft upon the fands, just like a spider; Eleanor, who saw it first, screamed out, and taking me by the hand, ran to our cave, where we hid ourselves; for we thought the great beaft was coming after us. We staid there till the heat of the day, crying and screaming dreadfully; but finding it did not follow us, we grew calm, and I began to think of the great pear which had frightened us, and afterwards proved fo good: fo I said to Eleanor, " Let us go and see if the great beaft is still there." "Ah!" she replied, it will eat us." "No," faid I, "if it wants to eat us, I will throw a great stone, and kill it."-Eleanor confented, and we went foftly to the place where we had feen it, and in its room found feveral yellow eggs. We did not much like the looks of them, but I was fo hungry, that I foon took

lov

wa

foo

in t

anot feek

beak

from and

than

fand:

apple " He

for r

took

courage

no

but feaama · O, we ands. firft, an to ought staid ming , we pear red fo fee if plied, nts to it."-place feve-

looks

n took

ourage

courage to break one, and Eleanor and I fwallowed them one after another, and found them nicer than the eggs we had eaten with mama. was very lucky, father, that we found them, for we felt as if we should fall and die for want of food; but after we had eaten the eggs we grew strong again, and began to speak of what had happened to us. Still we called upon Derley, hoping in time to awake him, and at last grew so weary and fick, that we lay ourselves down to sleep till another fun. This too we fpent in crying, and feeking food. A very pretty little bird, with a long beak, and black and blue feathers, let its nest fall from a tree, and we found in it some eggs, whole and broken, but much smaller, and more yellow than those which the great beast had left on the fands. We divided them, and at the same time, I faw lying on the ground two of the same large apples which had before fallen from the tree. "Here, fifter," faid I, " is one for you and one for me." We afe them, and then went to the tree which gave the water, and sucked till we were no longer dry. In this manner, father, we lived for feveral funs, and were only forrowful when we entered the cave where poor Derley continued to fleep without speaking: still we hoped he would wake, and a thought one fun came into my head, as we flood on the fea-shore, looking at the great fire which shines in the heavens. "What shall we do, fifter," faid I, "to count the funs Derley thall have flept, that we may tell him when he awakes?" We both thought a good while; but at last, Eleanor took a flint, and said, " Let us make a stroke upon this great tree every time the Sun comes back to us; Derley knows how to read, and he will tell when he awakes." Since that time we have not passed one sun without making a stroke on the tree; you have read them, father, and know how many there be."

C 5

Here the Colonel could no longer retain his admiration: he embraced his two little friends, addressed fome exclamations to Heaven, and desired Ambrose to continue his recital, which he did in these words.

" We

ge

tre

bi

br

mı

haj

the

ma

and

cavi

fam

ever

fom

for t

WOO

but 1

they

there

great

ened

ran fe

hist

ved hen ued ould ead, reat ll we erley en he but at make e Sun read, e that naking father, his adids, addefired ne did in a We

"We every day found food, and began to forget our griefs, when I thought to myself, if these trees should not let fall any more apples, nor these birds their nests; if those great beafts should not bring us any more eggs, what must we do? We must try to get fomething to eat, if all this should happen. Then I took fome stones, and threw them with all my strength at the trees, and a great many apples and nests fell at our feet. Eleanor and I gathered them up, and carried them to the cave, where we hid them under fome leaves of the fame trees, which are very large. We did this every fun, and were never in want of food; but fometimes we were very much frightened indeed! for those great beafts you have feen, father, in the woods, would come by night almost into our cave; but we always hid ourselves behind Derley, and they went away without biting us. One night there came a horse that had a long neck, and a great lump upon its back: the fight of it frightened us fo much, that we fled out of the cave, and ran screaming violently, till coming to a tree, I hal fet c 6 fet my feet and hands against it, and grasping it very close, climbed quite to the top, calling to my sister to do the same. She followed my example, and the crooked horse, finding he could not get at us, went away directly, and when he was a good way off, we came down. Ah, father, we should have been very glad, if we had known the secret you have shewn us, of getting fire out of the stones, for we were sometimes cold. Our clothes got torn, and when they were very bad, we threw them away, and for some suns remained quite naked; but at last, we found the skin of a beast, which we divided between us; here it is still, what do you call it?"

"It is the skin of an otter," replied the Colonel. "Well, then," continued Ambrose, "this country is full of these otters. We will try to get a skin for you when your coat is worn out.

"Is this all that has happened, Ambrose?" said the Colonel. "Yes," said Ambrose, "all."— "But," returned the Colonel, "you have not yet spoken of the large black men you saw." "Oh,"

faid

fai

car

hor

bro

left

foo

to r eate

afke

the,

Wh

man

dired

my f

that :

fathe

the fi

of it,

thing

black

them

they c

inal

alitife

faid Ambrofe, "I forgot: in truth, we must take care of them." of Well," faid the Colonel, "but how came you to fee them?" "Why," faid Ambrofe, "one day when it was very bad weather, I left Eleanor in the cave, and went out to feek food, and when I came back, the came running to me, quite frightened, crying, "We shall be eaten-we shall be eaten-I have seen-" I asked her what? "Great ugly black men," said the, " there-look-do you not fee them?"----While she was speaking, I saw afar off a great many black men, running one after the other. I directly let fall all that I had brought, and taking my fifter by the hand, we both ran to a dark cave that is under ground: if you stand where I do. father, you may fee it: there, on that fide where the fun appears: we hid ourfelves at the bottom of it, very much terrified; but not hearing any thing, came out from time to time, to fee if the black men were ftill there: at last we did not see them at all, and running to the fide from whence they came, we faw them a very great way off, in wal no a little it my

le,

bluc

ood

cret

nes,

rew

quite

Rill4

in Am

Colour this

to get

ii lo

1100-14

ot yet

faid

3 154 1

a little boat, that went very fast upon the water. They have been here fince, but we faw no more of their than we did at first; they never come this way, it is only in the great gardens, which you call woods, that we fee them: when they are gone, we find large large animals there skinned, trees quite destroyed, and the feathers of birds, which makes us think that thefe black men come here to kill the beafts, and to take the birds and apples. This, father, is all I can recollect : we have lived, as I have told you, from the time you fee the marks upon the tree, without doubt, through the goodness of the God whom you tell us of: till now we have faid the prayers mama taught us to the fun, who walks in the heavens, thinking he was God; but if you have another, we will pray to him, and be very good, that he may love us."

Ambrose ceased speaking, and the Colonel was filent a few minutes, to admire the hand of Providence in the preservation of these innocents! The green pears of which they spoke, he found no difficulty in judging to be Carasols, a fruit common

COL

the

cio

the

he

wh

pal

ove

ceix

ever

had

leng

fire

that

racu

be g

his y

the !

of a

fees

com

inter

common to North-America; the great beaft on the shore a tortoise, the eggs of which are delicious, and commonly deposited by this creature on the fands: the bird with black and blue feathers. he determined to be the colibri, and the water which flowed from the great tree, the sap of the palm; but more especially did he acknowledge an over-tuling Providence in the fuccour they had received from the goat: he had read of bears, and even lionesses, having suckled infants, but till now had juftly confidered fuch stories as fabulous. At length, taking Ambrose by the hand, " The defire you express, my fon," faid he, " of knowing that powerful and beneficent Being, who has miraculously preserved you amidst these deserts, shall be gratified: too great to render himself visible to his weak creatures, know, my child, that, from the height of Heaven, he watches over the conduct of all men: nothing escapes him, he knows all, fees all, hears all, and with a glance of his eye, comprehends the whole earth." "The earth !" interrupted Ambrose, "do you mean the country hotel. where nore this

are ined, oirds,

e you rough

and

f: till t us to

ing he

f Pro-

ocents!

a fruit

AMBROSE AND ELEANOR.

where we live?" "The earth, my children, I need not tell you, faid the Colonel, is the ground on which we tread, but it consists not only of this island, it extends beyond the seas, and contains four great countries, which are called Europe, Mia, Africa, and America, which last is the part of the world we are now in."

"Then this island," faid Ambrose, " is America?"

"No," replied the Colonel," but it makes a part of it."

"We do not," faid the children, "understand you." "When you are further instructed," faid the Colonel, "when I shall have taught you to read and write, you will perfectly comprehend all this: at present it will be sufficient to acquaint you that this great Being, who is called God, created all things: the Sun, which has hitherto been the object of your adoration, and which communicates light and heat to all nature, was formed by his word: he has furnished the earth with thousands of beautiful plants and animals: we can beho almi your and i you i > vour piness An

with a nappie hey fu nared erfelf valked Il she

olonel

lves to

terrup

behold shtened

ANTHONY AND STEAM

behold nothing that does not speak his praise and almighty power: to him, my children, you owe your being: his word called you into existence, and his mercy renders that existence a blessing: you must look up to him as the author of all good, and to please him, be humble, meek, and endeavour to imitate his perfections, by diffusing happiness to every creature around you."

Ambrose and Eleanor listened to this discourse with an attention from which their friend drew the appiest presage: the day passed insensibly away; hey supped in the new cabin, and afterward presared to occupy their hammocks. Eleanor busied erself for some time about her chamber; she walked in it a great while, and did not go to sleep all she had twenty times examined and changed he place of the little furniture it contained. The colonel and Ambrose, neighbours to each other, scoursed for some time; then resigning themlives to the powers of sleep, they enjoyed an unterrupted repose. The rising sun at length enthaltered, the cabin, when the Colonel, finding that

nded him

ind lied tis or bar es a

me-

stand faid ou to nd all quaint

mmu-

formed h with

we can

behold

that his pupils were fill buried in a profound fleep, took them gently by the hand, and with pleafure faw them open their eyes, firetch first one arm, then the other, raife their heads, and finile on him with an inexpressible grace. "You flould give an example to your fifter, Ambrofe," faid he, " and be beforehand with the Sun." fcorci "Forgive me, dear father," faid Ambrofe, "but cientl we have flept in fuch a good bed!" rock,

"It is enough, my fon," replied the Colonel, peftle " but to-morrow, and every future day, you must to por at day-break repair both of you to the fea-shore, that the and offer your thanks and prayers to the Being and th who has preferved you during the night." This cloth, the children affured him they would not fail of afterw doing do bai badlagaza zani graswi bed sall flones,

Having erected and furnished his little dwell being ing, the Colonel was refolved to vifit the interio was pr part of the island, that he might more particular fire, a examine its vegetable productions, and execut the pal the projects he had formed: he accordingly he ed the out, and had not advanced far before he discovere discovere plair oque pursi two in ha was plain

island,

plains covered with rice and maize, and manifound oque. These were the principal objects of his with pursuit: with the assistance of the children, about first two bushels of maize was gathered, and conveyed , and in hammocks to the cabin. Some handfuls of this You was spread upon the turf, and exposed to the rofe," fcorching heat of noon, which foon dried it fuffiin." is but ciently to grind. The Colonel then made, in a rock, a hole in the form of a mortar, and with a Inh colonel, peftle of wood broke the grains, and reduced them ou must to powder. It was then necessary to winnow it, a-shore, that the chaff might be separated from the grain, e Being and this he performed by shaking it violently in a This cloth, which Ambrose and Eleanor held extended: fail of afterwards it was ground into flour between two fones, and diluted with water. A little brandy le dwell being mixed with this paste, by way of leven, it e interio was put to bake upon flints strongly heated by the rticular fire, and thus a bread, very light and agreeable to execut the palate, was made. While the children watchlingly fe ed the bread, the Colonel returned to make fresh discovere discoveries: he found, as he proceeded into the

plais

island, a great deal of millet, but different from that of Europe, and fine potatoes, which he knew would afford them excellent nourishment; he discovered also some green figs, and a variety of wholesome and delicious fruits common to America; but for these, it was necessary to go far into the ifland, which became an inconvenience: to remedy it, therefore, with the affiftance of his little pupils, he dug up and fowed a piece of land, near the cabin, which extended from the fea-shore to the forest, which served as its boundary. This sort of orchard in the end furnished them with maize, rice, millet, potatoes, and all the most useful and delicious productions of the foil.

The Reader having now feen our islanders furnished with the first necessaries of life, will not, perhaps be displeased to learn in what manner they employed their time. In the morning the Colonel took Ambrose into the woods with him to hunt, having for this necessary purpose fabricated a bow about three feet and a half long, the string of which was a gut twisted, and the arrows a stick furni Hint

ferent lags,

ind th

ent fo

loyed ices o

ufied

vere d

each,

ne last

riptio

e Rea

mmo

ws fu pecial hich a

et, an red w hich an

th fou

furnished

from knew discoholeerica; to the to res little , near nore to his fort maize, ful and ers furrill not,

Colonel to hunt,

ed a bow Aring of s a stick

urnished

furnished with two feathers, and terminated by a fint sharpened: with these they killed the different animals that inhabited the woods, fuch as tags, goats, does, and among the birds the duck nd the foken, which furnished them with excelent food. During this time Eleanor was emloyed in baking the bread, or in other little ofces of domestic occonomy. On returning, they usied themselves in collecting the eggs which vere deposited by different fish upon the seaeach, but especially by the tortoise and alligator: e last mentioned is so singular, that a short deription of it may be deserving the attention of e Reader. The alligator is a fort of crocodile mmon to America: its head is large, and its ws furnished with strong teeth, two of which pecially are extremely long; it has four legs, hich are very short, and terminated by large et, and its back from the head to the tail is cored with strong scales, as also two large lumps hich are over the eyes; its stomach is furnished th four glands, and its tail always drags on the ground, ground. This animal lives indifferently on land foon or water, and is not mischievous but when pro. cel t voked: its eggs are esteemed a great dainty. The some cultivation of their field next engaged the attention tion of the Colonel and his pupils, after which one d they dined, and spent the afternoon in study or in why t gardening.

Nothing could exceed the attention of Ambrole el, and Eleanor to the lessons of their friend, who had essary found the means of teaching them, not only to e mai read, but to write. He had discovered in the wood "I a tree much refembling the fimpi of the Isled I wi Madagascar: its bark, after being exposed to the lain n Sun, became as white as paper, and though imple, fmelt a little of musk, this was easily weakened and wo by exposing it to the fumes of aromatic herbs: 1 ou not the foot of this flowed a fort of gum, much like his that of the Indian fig-tree, the sap of which is use roat o by the Indians to colour their veffels black. Bein fould e thus furnished with paper and ink, he soon adde at driv pens; he shaped them with his knife, and plait? them into the hands of his young pupils, who we

foo

Me

land foon able to write and read, and consequently to procel the value of those books (for among them were ome of the best authors) which had been taken from the wreck. "Pray, father," said Ambrose which one day, laying down a book, "explain to me why or in why they have kings in the countries I read of."
Men living in society, my son," said the Colombrose el, "in which there are good and bad, it is newho had essay to establish rulers, that order and peace may only to emaintained."

I will endeavour," replied his friend, "to exect to the lain myself more clearly: suppose now, for exchough it mple, there were in this island a great many men weakens and women who lived together in common, can herbs: a ou not conceive that one would wish for the field much like his neighbour, that another would cut the ich is use roat of his enemy without pity; that this man ck. Bein ould enter our cabin to seize upon our food, and soon adde at drive us from it to establish his own residence e, and pt it?

"How!"

, who we

"How!" exclaimed the children with aftonishment, "are men capable of this?"

"I am ashamed, my children," said the Colonel, "to reply that they are; and that, unfortunately, the number of the wicked surpass that of the good." "Ah, Eleanor," exclaimed Ambrose, "let us stay in our isle!"

"Hear me to an end," interrupted the Colonel; "what I have faid granted, you will fee that it is necessary to establish laws to render our habitations and property secure, and also to invelocertain individuals with a power to enforce those laws: this power is not, however, always invested in one man, but sometimes in a certain number chosen by the body of the people; this form of government is called a republic; the other, when a king governs, a monarchy."

"I comprehend very well what you fay, father," faid Ambrose, "but is it not strange that men should be so wicked as to render these law necessary?"

from whi

quei

feri

rice :

"

can e els gi

t."

" In he rich

those onstitu

"W

u four

Colo-

mith-

that of

will fee ader our invested

form of

u fay, fa range tha these law

44

"It is a melancholy proof, my fon," replied the Colonel, " of the depravity of human nature; from pride, envy, ambition, and avarice, vices which are the more dangerous in community, as opportunities of calling them forth more frequently occur, spring all the various evils and miferies of life."

"Pray, father," faid Ambrose, "what is ava-

"An inordinate defire of possessing more than we can enjoy," said the Colonel: "you will scarcely believe, my child, that there are beings who possess great wealth, and bury, without employing."

"In what, then," faid Ambrose, "consists he riches of your country, father?"

"Alas, my fon!" returned the Colonel, "it those miserable pieces of gold and silver which pushitute all the happiness and misery of life."

"What! those," exclaimed the children, "that u found upon Derley?"

"The fame," replied the Colonel; "those pieces stamped with the image of the ruling power qui are divided into small and great coin, each of ret a proportionate value, and with these are procured and a ed all the commodities of life."

"What," faid Eleanor, "do men agree to pay one another for things that belong alike to every rose, one? I do not understand-"

"Oh, I understand very well," interrupta orm Ambrose, "and I could willingly pardon there is you for felling the works of art; if one man is wife berty or more skilful than another, he deserves a recomery to pence; but to assume a right over grain, wood eir no and all the common productions of the earth, the datte is indeed unreasonable."

"You do not reflect, Ambrose," said the Cos, or lonel, " that all these productions of the earth a ear, a quire culture, conveyance, and a thousand litt at phen cares which equally deferve reward: is the mer the who tills a field, fows it, and watches the veget at, fath tion of its produce, who gathers and carries its tten to terward into cities, obliged to take upon himlen?"

his

uin :

"

In

which

those his trouble? No, furely: if he consider gold an power quivalent, has he not a right to receive it? These ach of re the people, my child, who deserve payment, rocur. and not those who by their multiplied depredations uin and oppress their country."

"Your observation, my dear father," said Amto every rose, is very just; I did not consider."

e to pay

In this manner the Colonel endeavoured to inerrupted orm the minds, and rectify the judgment of on there is young pupils: toward fun-fet, they were at is wife berty to run, jump, and take the exercise necesa recomery to strengthen their constitutions, and render n, wood eir nerves supple; but in the evening, rational arth, the d attentive, they listened, on the sea-shore, to e lessons of their good friend on morality, phythe Cos, or religion. One evening, when the sky was e earth ar, and strewed with stars, Eleanor observed afand little at phenomenon which we generally express uns the mar the name of "a falling star." "What is the veget at, father?" faid she, "I have many times forarries it ten to ask you why we see the stars falls so ofon himita?" "That, Eleanor," faid the Colonel, which appears to you a star, is not one; it is fpark of elementary, or rather electrical fire which thines in the ethereal region, and evaporate by the shock of a current of air." offe shuss si

D 2

"I do not," faid Eleanor, " understand wh you mean by electricity."

"Be attentive then," faid the Colonel. "Eld tricity is a matter of fire invisible to our eyes, b which nevertheless exists; penetrates all bodies gives to one vegetation, to another trepidation, another impulsion, &c."

"Explain this more clearly, dear father," f Eleanor.

" Electricity," continued the Colonel, " can the vegetables to grow, agitates the air we breat drives the winds with more or less violence, per ut cea trates our bodies, and gives them strength, a he Sur health; fortifies, and even preserves in us the hillion tal principle; it renders our blood active warm, quickens, and is, perhaps, the cause of circulation."

" I understand this very well," faid Eleanor

"Well then," faid the Colonel, "this elect cal r oppo duce

his which

akes "

fot re fp

" N tars a

lobes

er; i ear le

re fix ance o ght an

* Thi s work it is a cal matter, the element of every thing that exists, opposed by a current of air, kindles itself, and proaporate duces the appearance you have observed *: from his cause also proceed; those spontaneous fires which we often fee on the banks of moraffes or akes.

"I comprehend this very well," faid Eleanor: eyes, be fo then all those stars that we see in the heavens bodies re sparks of electrical fire?"

ation, "No, Eleanor," replied the Colonel, "those tars are bodies of surprising magnitude; they are her," fe clobes like the earth we inhabit, but much larer; it is their distance only that makes them ap-, " cau ear less. Among an infinity of others, there we breat re fix called Planets, which revolve, withence, per ut ceasing, round that wonderful body of light ength, in he Sun, which is computed to be upwards of a us the million of times as large as the earth. The difactive ance of these globes from the Sun, which dispenses cause of ght and heat to them all, is so immense, that numbers

H Eleanor this elec

cc Ele

* This opinion is supported by the Abbé Bertholon, in is work entitled Physic des Methores.

numbers can scarcely convey an idea of it, and their velocity is no less amazing. Mercury, which is the planet nearest to the Sun, is about thirty-seven million of miles distant from it, and move at the rate of a hundred and five thousand mile every hour, completing his course round the Sun in rather less than three months. Venus, which is the next planet above Mercury, is fixty-eight millions of miles from the Sun, and by moving seventy-six thousand miles every hour, performs it revolution in twenty-three days and twenty-twe hours. The next planet above Venus is the Earli upon which we live: its distance from the Sun minety-sive millions of miles, and by travelling the rate of sifty-eight thousand miles every hour-

"How!" interrupted the children, "does the

"Yes," faid the Colonel, "it turns once in twenty-four hours quite round; and by this motion occasions the apparent motion of the Sun and all the heavenly bodies, from east to west, in the same time: its revolution round the Sun is conplete føme but I

year,

million five the

Sun in

wenty

Still hi

t the

inishe: rears a

Besidence and lanets

plete

pleted in three hundred and fixty-five days and something less than fix hours, or the space of a year, which causes the variation of the seasons: but I shall explain this more fully hereafter.

" Above the Earth's orb is Mars, whose difance from the Sun is a hundred and forty-four millions of miles; it travels at the rate of fiftyive thousand miles an hour, and goes round the on in fornething lefs than two of our years.

" Jupiter, the largest of the planets, is still furher removed from the Sun; it is twenty times the ize of our Earth, and travels at the rate of wenty-nine thousand miles an hour, completing ts journey in something less than twelve years. still higher in the system, about nine millions of niles from the Sun, is Saturn, who, by travelling t the rate of twenty-two thousand miles an hour, inishes his course in about twenty-nine of our ears and a half.

Besides these, which are called Primary Planets, here are in our system others, called secondary lanets, or fatellites, which move round the pla-

D 4

nets

plete

d mile the Su

it, and

which thirty-

move

vhich i tht mil ving fe orms i nty-tw e Earth

ne Sun elling

hourdoes th

once this mo

Sun al ft, in th

n is com

nets in the fame manner as their primaries do round the fun. The first of thefe is the moon, which accompanies the earth in its annual progress round the fun, completing its circuit round the earth in the space of twenty nine days and twelve hours. As the moon receives its light from the fun, and prefents only one fide to us, in the course of its monthly journey, we fee more or less of its enlightened fide, according to its different position with respect to that part of the earth we inhabit, and hence arises the different appearances which we express under the name of new and full moon, &c. Four of these satellites or moons attend Jupiter, and five * Saturn; besides these five moons, a broad flat luminous circle called his ring, encircles without touching the body of Saturn at a distance nearly equal to the breath of the ring, which is about twenty one thousand miles. Some astronomers have thought, that this ring is composed of a vast number of moons or satellites,

which,

which may,
whol
upon lame
"wh
and be w
rious

mica nishe he ha

necel

In

vellir whof wher

them

was a

platio

Rein

* Modern astronomers have discovered two more of these moons which attend Saturn.

which, being feen at fuch an immense distance, may, by means of their blended light, give the whole the appearance of one continued body; upon this an eminent aftronomer, whose works I lament not being able to put into your hands, fays; " when we consider the remote situation of Saturn, and confequently how much the fun's light must be weakened before it can reach him, fuch a glorious affemblage of moons does not appear an unnecessary appendage to this planet."

In this manner the Colonel began his aftronomical lectures. The two children looked up aftonished at the prodigious magnitude of those globes he had been describing, and were desirous of travelling into the planets, especially into Saturn, urn at a whose ring and five moons astonished them: but ne ring, when in due time their worthy instructor spoke to them of the fixed stars, each of which he told them was a fun, supposed to enlighten other systems of worlds, they were lost in the stupendous contemplation, and could only in filence adore the great Being who formed and animated the whole. The re of these

es do

noon,

ogress

d the

welve

m the course

s of its

t poli-

we in-

arances

ind full

ons at-efe five

is ring,

Some

is com-

atellites,

which,

Colonel was delighted to fee their young minds gradually expand, and was studious to render even the most trifling incidents subservient to their improvement. One day as Eleanor entered the cabin, she exclaimed in an extacy, "Oh father! if you had but feen what I have!"

"What was it, Eleanor?" faid her friend, smil-" As I was gathering vegetables," fhe replied, "upon the great rock, I saw two of those little creatures you, I believe, call lizards, crawl to a hole in the rock, each bearing a small stalk full of feeds. They laid down their provision at the entrance, and went in, but directly came out accompanied by an old lizard, much larger than they were; he began to eat the feeds, and the two little ones looked at him without stirring; but the noise I made frightening them all three, the old one, in attempting to get away, fell down. I took it up, and was furprised to see that it was blind the lin While I was examining it, I observed that the doubt two little ones were fearching for it with the greatest uneafmess, so I put it on the edge of the hole and rejoi little of th 44

them could

pure to an

66

"

turne

46 '

66 ] faid th

minds r even ir im-

he caher! if

, fmilthe ref those crawl

11 Stalk ifion at me out er than

the two but the the old

. I took as blind

the hole,

and directly they all three went in, as if they were rejoiced to have escaped so great a danger. The little lizards must certainly have been the children provement. One day as Eleanor, snortests shaho

"Perhaps they were," faid the Colonel.

" I was quite delighted," faid Eleanor, " to fee them carry food to their poor blind father, who could no longer feek it for himfelf."

"You fee, Eleanor," faid the Colonel, "that the pure sentiment of filial tenderness is given alike to animals and to men."

"Animals have then a foul?" faid Eleanor.

"Why do you prefume that they have?" returned the Colonel.

"They have, at least, reflection," faid Eleanor.

"Upon what do you found your conclusion?" faid the Colonel.

"Why," faid Eleanor, " is it not evident that the lizards must have reflection? They, without that the doubt, fay to themselves, our father is blind and he great old, he cannot feek food for himself; it is, therefore,

D 6

and

fore, our part to carry it to him, that he may live ministed to have clouped in an the longer."

"I am pleased with your argument, Eleanor," faid the Colonel, as it springs from the goodness No; and fimplicity of your heart; but I will teach you are g to account more rationally for what you have feen; talian many celebrated naturalists have given examples only equally striking of the seeming rationality of animals. The intellectual faculties may be divided they into two kinds, foul and instinct. The foul is that fensa portion of us, which reflects, foresees, examines, or wo and compares. Inflinct is that natural fentiment prove which leads us to preferve our being, to tremble facult at the fight of a wound, and to compassionate at no for unfortunate being. Some philosophers have given tile, to this last faculty the name of sympathy. What childre ever it be, it is that alone which animates animals five an and dissolves with their machines. Instinct serve ble; a them instead of reflection. The lizards do not, and cel you imagine, fay, "Let us comfort our father. stones They do not know him under that character: the animal are ignorant that they owe their life to him, bu "Ho

they then ciou

y live anor," ch you

the

they love and comfort him because nature prompts them to it. Do you think, my child, that ferocious animals reflect when they fall upon you? odness No; neither, by the same rule, would those that are gentle, should you treat them ill, resolve to rere feen; taliate. They have passions, but they owe them amples only to the organization of their machine, and to of ani- the nature of their instinct. Had they reflection, divided they would feel grief, inquietude and melancholy, l is that fensations which they experience only when fick amines or wounded. Suffrance is the only fentiment they ntiment prove, and this alone can effect their spirits or their tremble faculties. So you fee, Eleanor, that animals have mate at mo foul; but they have an inftinct fo acute, fo fubwe given tile, that it is easily mistaken. There are, my What children, three forts of existence. The first, pasanimals five and infensible; the second, active and fensi-& serve ble; and the third, active, sensible, and rational. do not,2 A celebrated naturalist said formerly*, "That father. stones grew, vegetables grew and lived, and that eter: the mimals grew, lived and felt."

him, bu "How!" exclaimed Eleanor, "have trees life?"

" Undoubtedly,

Linnæus.

" Undoubtedly," replied the Colonel, " the fap is their blood, and the elementary or electrical fin During four years, wishid right to slein girl

"They must then," faid Eleanor, " feel pain resid when we cut them ment tool sti no encitavely

"No," faid the Colonel, "their life is only pass help sive; they have neither passions nor affections; he di but in other respects, they are subject to the same gree, vicisfitudes that animals are: they exist, they grow, grees they decrease, and are subject to sicknesses, as we mild, are."

"It is very singular," faid Eleanor.

"The more you study nature, my child," fail exhala the Colonel, "the more will it exalt your ideas of was for that great Being, who with a single word create of the ed fo many wonders."

"We will never," faid the children, " cease to he dre adore him, we will love, obey, and pray to him he tre that our foul, which you have taught us is immor mals w tal, may live with him for ever, when our bodies ocks are like poor Derley's.

This conversation led to digressions on mora ic of lity a more

D

ferva

ng fi contin

night

ervati

lity

he fap lity and metaphysics, which furnished discourse for al fine more than eight days.

During four years, which the Colonel had now pain resided in the island, he had had time to make obfervations on its foil and temperature. By the ly pale help of his compass, and knowledge of physics, ctions; the discovered that it was situated near the 22d dene fame gree, 30 min. north latitude, and about 304 dey grow, grees W. longitude. The air was extremely , as we mild, ice and fnow being equally unknown: durng fummer, which began about November, and continued till April, neither clouds, vapours, nor d," fail exhalations were to be seen. The atmosphere ideas of was fo clear, that not only the rising and fetting d create of the fun, but the increase and wane of the moon night be seen even in full days. At this season cease to the drought was so great that the leaves fell from y to him he trees, every plant drooped, and even the anis immormals withdrew into the woods or the hollows of ur bodic ocks to feek the coolness necessary to their preervation; but when the fun approached the troon mora ic of Cancer, the vapours it exhaled from the lity

fea,

fea and marthes; condenfed into thick clouds, from whence iffued lightning and thunders, ac. companied with torrents of rain, which continued during eight or ten days ! thefe rains, which cook Vint ed the air, induced the Colonel to diffinguish this feafon by the appellation of Winter; though very different from the Winters of Europe it pro-idity duced in Nature the most favourable change llow Scarcely does the month of May diffuse her falle ere f tary coolness through the air, when the trees reco ver their former verdure. The forests exhale ws f thousand odours; the animals, more agile descent ere n from the mountains or iffue from the holes of ey fn rocks; the birds feem to revive to a new being ended and renew their concerts; testaceous animal eir he change their shells; reptiles their skins; and the darm fish, quitting the open sea, enter the rivers, an hese re feem to prefent themselves an easy prey to the no fisherman. od so aboow od o si would we sid ts, wi

There was in the island a fort of tree from me in which flowed a whitish gum so ductile that The might be drawn out into threads: of this Elean afures

hade

ous

ort

ood i

ous

ma

nade nets, with which they caught the most delilouds, ious fish, such as thornback, mullet, doree, &c. S, acninued ortoiles of all kinds were fo abundant during h cool Vinter, that they furnished our islanders with ish this god for the Summer, a feafon when these amphigh versious animals do not appear, on account of the it pro- idity that reigns. In the course of May, large change ellow and red ferpents, eight or ten feet long, her fally ere found in the moraffes: the heads of these es reco ceatures were in the form of a triangle, and their exhale ws furnished with long sharp teeth; but they descent ere not dangerous. About this time also, large holes bey fnakes, tufted, and spotted with black, deew beingended with a great noise from the mountains: animal eir heads were about the fize of one's hand, flat, ; and the darmed with eight teeth about an inch long. ivers, an hese reptiles were perfectly inoffensive, and havrey to the no fort of venom, made war only upon the ts, which furprifing their enemies when afleep, tree from me in battalions to prey upon their eyes.

ile that The Colonel, who was formed equally for the ais Elean asures of a contemplative as he was for the active scenes of a military life, spent the Winter in studying Nature, and the Summer, when the hear was intense, in philosophical reflections; bu thefe could not banish from his remembrance. wife and child, who possessed his fondest affections and to whom he had now loft all hope of returning: their image was prefent in every pursuit and in spite of his fortitude, he was at times me lancholy and dejected. On these occasions Elecnor and Ambrose endeavoured, by their innoces careffes, and a thousand little tender cares, to di fipate his forrows and restore him to chearfulness their affection called forth on his part an equal n turn; with delight he faw their young minds in bibe instruction, and their susceptible hearts es afety. pand with every virtue: then calling to mindth hopeless state in which he had first discovere them, and beholding himself in the hand of Pro vidence, an instrument of their happiness, held in the pleafing contemplation, the remembrant egan t of his forrows: nay, hope itself once more n vived, and flattered him with one day restoris then he h

m26

tive

been

plea

fand bling

146 Spe

> 46 the

"

10"

11 33 ourfe

"7

hildre "N

ary th

nd Ele

afi

the

purfuit;

equal re

liscovere hildren.

the

inter in them to fociety, and being himfelf reunited to all he head he held dear. He was one day indulging these pleasing reflections, when the children, who had rance theen in the wood amufing themselves with a thouections and little games, returned to him, pale, tremreturn-bling, and fcarcely able to fpeak.

- "What is the matter, Ambrose?" faid he: mes me Speak, Eleanor; what has happened?"
- ns Elea "They are come!" faultered the children; innoces " they are in the island!"
- "Whom do you mean?" faid the Colonel.
- rfulness "The great naked men," they replied.
- "Well," faid their friend, "do not alarm ninds in yourselves; we must retreat to some place of earts es afety.
- mindth "They will not come on this fide," faid the
- d of Po "No matter," said the Colonel, "it is necess, he los ary that we conceal ourselves:" saying this, he embrand egan to strip the cabin, and, assisted by Ambrose more n and Eleanor, carried the most precious moveables restoring a subterraneous cave, the entrance of which

was

was accessible only to those acquainted with in windings. Here they remained fome time, when the Colonel, not hearing any thing, and wishing to fee the extremity of the danger which threatened them, as also whether the savages bent their steps toward his beloved cabin, went out, accompanied by his little friends, who refused to be left behind and lying flat on his stomach, on the summit of a mount that overlooked the ifle, beheld the favages, to the number of about forty or fifty, quit their canoes, and advance into the island. Their skins were painted of such a deep red, that being almost naked, in the fun they more nearly refembled boiled lobsters than men; and to add to their grotesque appearance, round their bodies, or all fides, hung plates of metal, the form of which the Colonel, however, could not perfectly determine. The women, distinguishable by their children, which they carried on their backs, wor ruly a pagne or camisa round their waist, close quatte than that of the men, and about two or three ouring inches deep. Having taken from their canon with as netra ind t whole he C rom They wood. lain, arrot ruped

hamr

rood ng th uanti

ones

nanne

nes of vhich

hammock

claws

ammocks, arms, and different utenfils, they peith its netrated further into the ille, entered the forest, when and began to hunt. This exercise continued the ning to whole day and part of the night, during which atened he Colonel and his pupils, not daring to descend ir steps rom the mount, were witnesses of all that past. panied They faw them toward morning iffue from the behind, wood, carrying with them the beafts they had nmit of lain, goats, otters, antas, and a great number of the faarrots and other birds. Immediately the qualy, quit rupeds were skinned, the flesh cut up, and the Their at being ones separated. A fire was then kindled, in the nanner of the negroes, by rubbing two pieces of arly reo add to wood violently together, and they fet about drefodies, of ing their meats. A large vessel, containing a of which wantity of crabs, was then brought, and smaller ly determes of palm wine, brandy, camphire, &c. after heir chil which they began their repast. It was a fight eks, wor ruly comic, to fee all thefe coloured favages ft, close quatted, like fo many monkies, in a circle, deo or the ouring with an excessive appetite, and picking eir canor with as much agility as eagerness, even the smallest nammock

claws of the crabs, which are confidered among and them as a great dainty. Having drank repeated lent draughts of palm wine and brandy, they begante he u shout, sing, and burst into fits of excessive laugh. seful ter, opening an enormous mouth, and discovering the the whitest and most beautiful teeth in the world: ay but foon growing intoxicated, they rose, leaped lerto gambolled, and committed a thousand extravagancies; till this noify feast being ended, they or wishe a fudden overturned their utenfils, carried them rubs away, and ran half mad to their canoes, which fwift as an arrow, conveyed them from the island When they were at some distance, the Colone and his two pupils descended from the mountain ince, and replaced in their cabin the moveables the had for safety deposited in the subterranean care at issi Exhausted with fatigue and hunger, they did no sam b that night go to reconnoitre the place where they thro favages had been feasting, but the next morning trave early they fet out, and arrived at the field of a gred to They found there baskets, knives, and is ind wooden cups, which the favages, in their half y adv

21

among peated

21

nd intoxication, had left behind them, besides lenty of good cheer. They took from among eganto he utenfils fuch as appeared to them the most laugh feful and curious, and having rested and refreshovering themselves, again set out for their cabin. Their world: ay was through a wood, which they had hileaped, erto but little frequented, and they stopped to extrava- imire a grot upon which Nature seemed to have they or wished all her beauties. Concealed by cotton ed them rubs and bananas, the shade of which gave a re-, which gious aspect to the place, they gained the enhe island ance by a path hollowed out of the rock, and Colons redered by a thousand aromatic plants. The ennountain ince, arched and ruinated, was enlightened only bles the a reflexion which the light threw on a rivulet ean cave at iffued from the grot: the banks of this y did no cam being more elevated, formed a natural footwhere they through the grot, at the bottom of which t morning travellers observed a faint light, which apield of a gred to shine through the chinks of the rock. nives, and is induced them to enter, but scarcely had their half y advanced many paces, when deep groans feemed feemed to proceed from the further part of the orro grot. The Colonel stopped :- and the children the alarmed, in vain endeavoured to articulate found which fear froze upon their lips. They advance anly a few paces farther; the groans became more de raspi stinct, and in a few minutes they heard the odder words repeated in a melancholy voice :- " Of eive i Death, when wilt thou come to my fuccour." olone " Heavens?" cried the Colonel, "what prodig " V is this? The accents are English!"

"Whosoever thou art?" returned the voice "T and action prominent cont

"Where are you?" interrupted the Colone ftill advancing; "who are you?" Col

"An unfortunate dying man," returned touch the in the lates were voice.

The Colonel still proceeded: the voice feem foon .familiar to his ear, but he could see nothing reshm At length, his eyes becoming more accuston peared to the gloom, he discerned on the ground a bit h som almost naked, which, on a closer view, he for ne. to be wounded. Shocked at a fight of fo ment, ar

hon

nce ha

wh

found

t of the orror, he knelt down, and taking the hand childre f the stranger, "Unhappy man," said he, e found what barbarian has treated you thus inhuadvante manly?"—He was continuing, when the stranger more derasping his hand to raise himself a little, on a ard the odden exclaimed, "Merciful Heaven! do I de-_ " Of eive myself—that voice—my honoured master cour." olonel Carlton-"

> "What do I hear?" cried the Colonel. "Per! Is it possible? Can it be?"

t prodig

he void

hon

nek!

"Thank Heaven!" faid the dying man, "I content; my dear master lives!---"

Colone "Talk not of dying, my faithful Peter," faid colonel, raising him, and endeavouring to turned the mch the blood with his handkerchief, " Province has not restored you to take you from me sice seem soon.—Eleanor, Ambrose, run to the cabin, e nothin freshment is necessary."--- The children difaccuston peared in an instant, and presently returned und a bigth some goats milk, tortoise eggs, and palm w, he for he. The stranger took a little of this nourishof fo ment, and was much revived; but the Colones found that he was not in a state to be removed: he conveyed therefore to the grot, hammocks, mats, and fuch things as were necessary to render it commodious, and attended him there, till finding, in the course of a few days, that his patient had gained a little strength, he determined to remove him to the cabin. It was an interesting fight, to fee this worthy man bearing his old domestic upon his shoulders, Eleanor and Ambrole holding each of them a leg, to ease the fick man, and lighten the burden of their protector. The cabin was at fome distance from the grot, but, at last, they arrived at it, and Peter being laid in hammock, enjoyed foon after a comfortable repose. The Colonel, during his abode in the island, had had sufficient time for the study of bo tany, to know thoroughly the properties of the different simples it produced: this knowledge he ap plied fo fuccessfully, that in less than eight day Peter was out of danger, and at the end of month was perfectly restored to health.

The Reader will conclude that the Colonel

nceri hich l after "At

foun

yself i

led m endly

more

l furro

new r

n I loc

feeing had h

t you

during

oved: ocks, render 1 find-

during

ring this time, had put many questions to him ncerning his misfortunes, the particulars of hich he now wished to hear in the order as they d occurred; Peter one day, therefore, gave his patient after the following recital.

to re- "At the instant, Sir," faid he, " that the veseresting foundered, I followed your example; seized a old do ce of wood to affift me in swimming, and threw mbrose felf into the sea. I struggled long against the k man, lence of the waves, but at length my strength . The led me: I swooned, I believe, and let go the but, at endly oar that supported me, for I remember aid in more till I found myself stretched in a canoe, able re- furrounded by five or fix naked men of the in the ft frightful colour. My ideas were confused; dy of bottonew not what to think: I cast my eyes on the f the differ plain of waters, enlightened by the moon: ge he ap n I looked round for you, my dear master, but eight days feeing you, and recollecting the fatal events end of had happened, my heart funk, and perfuaded you were fwallowed in the waves, an invo-Colone tary cry of horror and grief burst from me; this

11 7

. " I

anoe r

aughte

ny distr

ivided :

utes I

was co

Governo

ne rest,

id he,

this terrified the favages who furrounded me for much, that they would have thrown me into the will be fea, had I not, feeing their defign, foftened then by my prayers and tears. One of them at length was addressed me in a jargon, composed of Eng who, lish, Dutch, and French, of which I compre were c hended, From whence come you, White?"

"A vessel," I replied, "in which I sailed he we arri been wrecked, and I should without doubt ha guides perished, had you not preserved me." ribe of

- "What is your name, White?"
- " Peter-
- "Have you any knives or scissars about you toat, ar Peter?"
  - "I have only a knife."
  - "Give it me, White."
  - "There it is," faid I, giving it him.
  - "Come," returned he, "I will love the ate upo thou shalt be flave to the Grand Cacique."
  - "Oh, Heaven!" I exclaimed, "where do ceived mean to take me?"

me fo "To Friz," answered the negro, " and you nto the will be very happy."

d then "I now felt the full extent of my misfortune: lengt was condemned, I faw, to ferve the negroes, Eng who, from their ferocious aspect, I doubted not compre were cannibals; but lamentations were vain! Our anoe rapidly cut the waves, and at break of day ailed have arrived at the port of our destination. My abt ha ruides showed me in triumph to an innumerable ribe of inhabitants, who, burfting into fits of aughter, presently surrounded me, and encreased ny distress by their importunities. One cut my bout you oat, another tore my waistcoat; in short, they ivided my clothes among them, and in a few miutes I was naked as my hand. In this fituation: was conducted to the Grand Cacique, who is overnor of the Island. He was seated with great love the ate upon a hammock, in a cabin raised above le rest, and having, as I found, heard my story, ceived me with much kindness. "White," here do id he, " thou shalt be my slave; ferve me faithfully, and the foul that is in thy heart * will a mained joy in Heaven all the happiness that awaits the by the who have done well: I forbid thee to do the things, White: to drink my brandy, to rob me he Ca. and especially to see my wives. If thou dost an of these, I shall kill thee, and thy great foul wi gnoran float upon the ocean, and mix with the spirits what after diffuse evil upon the earth."

1.

ue."

"The Cacique ceased; and I, surprized to other this fingular harangue, could only bow in fignt ently h fubmission, shedding abundance of tears. H Greatness then took me by the hand, and order what one of his attendants to fill me a cup of brandy ago, St dispel my forrow.

The next day I began my labour, which ou must was to turn up the favannas, to plant, were beak for clear, and cultivate them: these, and a thousand ow in other fervices which were added, I perform the alfo without intermission during four years that I a hat I had

"T

"H

heir se

" Al

"Yo

has li

ished in little

main

* The Carribes imagine that every human being has many fouls as he has pulses in his arteries, and that principal of these resides in the heart.

will mained with these barbarians, known in Europe ts the by the name of Carribes, or cannibals."

to the "How!" interrupted the Colonel, "are these ob me he Carribes, inhabitants of the Antilles?"

dost and "The same, Sir," said Peter, "I was myself oul will gnorant of their name during a year, but I learnt rits what after from a French flave who lost his life in heir service. The isle we now inhabit, Sir, is rized to other than one of the Antilles, which appan fignt ently has not yet been discovered."

rs. H "Ah, my good Peter," faid the Colonel, orden what do you tell me? Am I so near Cuba, St. orandyl ago, St. Domingo, Porto Rico?"

"You undoubtedly are, Sir," faid Peter, "but , which ou must observe that the islands of which you t, wee beak form the Great Antilles, whereas this we thousand ow inhabit is in the Little Antilles. There erformere also other countries of the Carribes; but that I must I have left is fo favage and barbarous, and little commercial, that it is to be prefumed has little connexion with the Europeans estaished in the Great Antilles."

eing has

d that t

"Your observation is just, Peter," said the 0 lonel; but gracious Heaven! a possibility remains, arm -Hope once more tevives I shall again she da England! Yes, my children, I shall conduct your order to the abodes of men-to the bosom of my coulocks, try."- Such was the flattering prospect wing, acc which the vicinity of cities inhabited by civilia ade li men furnished Colonel Carlton: he did not refer the n that he was, nevertheless, separated from the d'at ti and that during four years which he had resided it w the island, he had never seen a human beinge after h cept the Carribes land upon it. The transporter t to which these hopes gave birth being, at lengthend t fomewhat calmed, Peter, at the request of g, on master continued his narrative.

"The Carribes with whom I lived, Sir, butten in very little commerce with the Europeans; the escap put to fea every year, and come into this illan happy kill buffaloes, otters, birds, &c. after which i mast go to the coasts inhabited by Europeans, and fill hi ter the skins of these animals, baskets, lizards, repres different forts of eggs, for knives, scissars, hat inself;

uch, I

good

MARCOSE AND ALL

Cier, faid the C the C

remains, arms, European linen, and especially brandy. gain he day fixed upon for their last voyage, my mafduct year ordered me to bring into the cance his hamny cou ocks, arms, and household utenfils: then havect wing, according to the custom of these idolaters, civilia ade libations to the good spirits, we embarked ot refer the number of fifty, as many women as men, m the dat the end of two days arrived at this island. resided is it was the first time, during four years, my being tafter had made me the companion of his voyage, transporter from it the happy presage of soon seeing at leng end to my captivity: for I doubted not meeteft of g, on some of the coasts at which we should ich, Europeans whom I should find means to Sir, beften in my favour and prevail on to affift me in ans; the escape. Alas! I foresaw not the issue of that is illan happy day. At the end of their brutal repast, which master, intoxicated with brandy, ordered me , and fill him another glass: I imprudently ventured i izards, represent to him mildly the injury he would do. ars, ha milelf; but instead of taking this as a mark of good-will, he seized me by the throat; "Ah,, dog of a white," faid he in a rage, "thou has without doubt robbed me—Die, and may the thousand souls go to the seas, to encrease the storms, and form the fires of Heaven!" Saying this, he gave me several stabs with a knife; but none of them were happily directed to the heart I had sufficient strength to retreat; and notwith standing the effusion of blood, gained a cave, in which I sunk down exhausted, and must have perished, had not Heaven in mercy conducted you my dear master, to the spot."

E 5

dogs

Eleanor and Ambrose, who had listened very attentively to Peter's narrative, were highly incensed against the Cacique, and expressed their indignation in very forcible terms; but Peter endeavoured to moderate it, by observing that the Carribes, though capricious and cruel, were only so when contradicted. "They cannot," said he, "bear to be dictated to; their pride upon this point is inconceivable; but they are humane, and have great compassion for women and children."

This led the Colonel to make some enquirie ribes, guinanthey v

false;
eaters,
if they
of fur;
the sie favage
prey:
is with are ve
their warri
in ger
agree;

en." of pr

flat ar

feroci

quine

concerning the laws and manners of the Carribes, and, especially, whether they were as sanguinary and fond of feeding upon human slesh, as they were represented by Europeans.

"Nothing, Sir," faid Peter, "can be more false; they are certainly anthropophagi, or maneaters, but it is from accident, not national tafte: if they devour their enemies, it is in the transport of fury, in the heat of conquest, and even upon the field of battle. They do not like to be called favages; this name, they fay, belongs to beafts of prey: they equally detest that of cannibal, which is with them equivalent to man-eater; but they are very fond of the title of Carribes, because in their primitive language, this word fignifies a good warrior, a courageous man. The Carribes are in general tall and well proportioned; they have agreeable features except the forehead, which is flat and much funk, a defect which gives them a ferocious air, and arises from a custom they have of preffing the heads of their infants with a little board, tied fast behind, and left there till the fore-

ldren." nquirie

u haft

ay the

efe the

Saying

e; but

heart

otwith-

ave, in

ave pe-

ed you,

ed ven

hly in

ed their

eter en

hat the

, were ot," faid

pon this

ane, and

ncerning

head has taken the form they wish, and is become to take fo flat, that without raising the head they can see feather almost perpendicularly above them.

"This custom," said the Colonel, " is not pe- under culiar to the Carribes; it is common to the carbets favages in other parts of America, and is faid to are of render the skull so hard, as frequently to have reeds, broken the fwords of the Europeans when they scendir made the conquest of Peru."

"The Carribes, Sir," faid Peter, " dye their carbet, skins red, not only for ornament, but to preserve a pallis them from being injured by the intense heat of the lodge the fun, and also to defend them from the musketto a kitch and other infects, which have an antipathy to the men an fmell of the oils, and different mixtures they use but who The women, who are shorter than the men, and surnitu have a more sprightly air, decorate themselves hammo with bracelets, fearings and necklaces of glass beads tied to and blue stones; from the age of twelve they wear general also a fort of cotton buskins, which reach about ouch, five or fix inches above the ancle bone, and are opeans wrought fo closely to the leg that it is impossible women racoli: of a his come

ot pe-

to take them off .- The ornaments of the men are n fee feathers and small plates of a metal they call caracoli; these they wear at their ears, nose, and under lip. The houses of the Carribes are called o the carbets, and like those of the Indians of Guiana, aid to are of a singular form; the lateral parts are of have reeds, and the covering of palm leaves: the roof dethe feending to the rafters, gives to the whole the form of a hive. At the distance of ten paces is another ye their carbet, half as large, separated into two parts by reserve a pallisade of reeds. The large carbet serves to t of the lodge the chief of the family, and the small one, as askettos a kitchen, and for the accommodation of the woy to the men and children, who never enter the great carbet ney use but when the master wishes to receive them. The en, and surniture of the womens carbet is baskets and emselve hammocks; of the mens, bows, arrows, zagayes*, as beads lied to the rafters, and hammocks; near which is ey wear generally a coffer, musket, sabre, pistol, and carth about ouch, effects which they exchange with the Euand are opeans for the productions of their country. The mpossible women are very dexterous in a fort of wicker * A long dart.

work

work, of which they make their hammocks, and very curious caskets. In these caskets, which are fo neatly wrought that no water can enter, they enclose their jewels and attire, and when they go to sea, fasten them to the edge of their canoes, that they may not lofe any thing should they turn over, which very frequently happens. The Carribes, who took me out of the sea, had encountered, as we had, all the violence of the tempest, but without any alarm; tied like their caskets to their case noes, they follow the revolutions of the waves turn with them, and continue their rout when the danger is past. They have among them a forto religion; the fun and moon have all their adortion, but they have neither temple nor form worship. Some of their laws announce very god fense; such, for example, as the not electing grand Cacique, till he has distinguished himself war, and is chosen by a plurality of voices; must also have borne away the prize in swin ming, strength, and fortitude. Surely, Sir, su a peop

a pe

comp ed, fhoul otter very after

them

"I

the restriction from quentil ject, a which

Pete but he being 1

lage, g

a people ought not to be compared to favage beafts."

The Colonel agreed with Peter, that such a comparison was by no means just; and then added, "It has often surprized me that the children should, upon their arrival in the island, have found otter skins, nay I myself," said he, "found some very sine ones when I made my researches the day after the Carribes had been feasting."

"Do not the Carribbeans," faid he, "carry them away, or is it an act of forgetfulness?"

"The latter, Sir," faid Peter, "appears to be the reason. A minutia would divert a Carribe from the most important occupation: they frequently take a deal of trouble to accomplish an enterprise, and if they are attracted by another object, abandon the former, at the moment often in which they are on the point of succeeding."

Peter had nearly completed three-score years, but he was still active and vigorous; his health, being perfectly re-established, he assisted at the tillage, grinding of corn, and at the most laborious occupations.

and ch are they ney go anoes,

ey turn e Car.

ounter-

heir ca waves,

hen the a fort d

form of

ecting i n fwim

Sir, sud

a peop

AMEROSE AND ELEANOR

occupations. He was extremely attached to the Colonel, in whose and his father's service, he had passed his youth; he was therefore treated by him rather as a faithful friend, than a domestic, especially now that one common misfortune united Peter, them. Peter foon became equally attached to Colon Eleanor and Ambrose: he would sometimes take cries of them upon his knee, and give them leffons of mo- from rality which experience alone had taught him; went and fometimes he would play with them like a could little child; fing them Carribbe fongs, and gam- nued, bol in the manner of the favages. In the mean knew while, under their indefatigable preceptor, they by necessary made a confiderable progress in history, geograph, were a the mathematics, poetry, and even music. The de that be scription which Peter had given them of a musical instrument called the balafo, used by the Car- through ribes, had excited their industry; they had invented and executed under the direction of their friend, s on fi one less complexed and barbarous: upon this the accompanied fongs, of which they composed both drenthe words and music themselves. The subjects heir heir

with t Th ing do

wen

were either their gratitude to the Supreme Being; to the their affection to each other, or the beauties of their illand, and the happiness they enjoyed in it with their dear Carlton and honest Peter.

Three years had revolved fince the arrival of united Peter, and feven fince his shipwreck, when the hed to Colonel was one night alarmed by confused es take cries or rather shouts near his cabin. He started of mo- from his hammock, opened the door foftly, and him; went out, but the night being extremely dark, he like a could not fee any thing. The shouts still contid gam- nued, but seemed at a much greater distance: he mean knew not what to think; but unwilling, till urged r, they by necessity, to alarm Peter or the children, who graph, were all three buried in sleep, he ascended a hill The de that bounded his enclosure to the north, and lookmusical ing down, perceived an enormous cloud of smoke e Car. through which flames of every colour foon found invent. passage. The forest that bounds his enclosure friend, s on fire! " Oh heavens!" exclaimed he, feeing his the he sparks carried toward his cabin, "my chilfed both dren-Peter"-and fuddenly darting from the hill,

Prince the arms of any bar show fubjects

wer

ne had

y him

espe-

he awakened Peter, took Eleanor in one hand fide th Ambrose in the other, and flew with them to the sea shore, while Peter, informed of all by the flames and fmoke he faw in the air, carried a few of the most valuable effects out of the cabin. He would have returned for what remained, but the wind blowing from the north, carried fo many lighted brands upon the little dwelling, that upon the wholly dried by the Sun, it became in a few mile but the nutes a prey to the flames. It is impossible to Peter, form a just idea of the grief and consternation of the Colonel and his three companions: the chil- faid he dren ran-screamed-and seemed ready to throw ed to h themselves into the flames to preserve their below probab ed abode, while the Colonel and Peter beheld the through fatal catastrophe buried in a stupid dejection. The the pa Colonel, however, at length recovering his usual ter with firmness, bent his steps, followed by his little friends and Peter, toward the summit of a neighbouring rock, from whence, casting his eyes evening round, he endeavoured to divine the cause of 1 when conflagration so fatal and unexpected. On one earther

ing to ribes o cipita reddiff them the fea gested

" V

"Y

fide

fide they beheld only a vast plain of fire, but looking toward the sea, they saw a crowd of the Carribes carrying off their effects, and embarking prela few cipitately in their canoes. The flames threw a reddish reflection upon the savages, and rendered them visible at the distance of half a league on the sea, their arms extended, and their eyes fixed upon the burning forest. Little doubt remained ew mi but that the disaster originated with them, and Peter, somewhat recovered from his terror, suggested a very probable cause. "It is evident, Sir," faid he, "that the Carribes have, as usual, landthrow ed to hunt in the forest, and it appears to me very probable that this accident may have happened neld the through the stratagem they make use of to catch the parrots, which, among other things, they baris usual ter with the Europeans.

"Why," faid the Colonel, "do they use fire?" "Yes, Sir," faid Peter; "they observe in the is eyes evening the trees upon which these birds perch, and fe of 1 when it is dark, tie to some of the lower branches an On one earthern pot in which they put lighted wood, and upon

fide

hand

to the

by the

. He

ut the many

, that

fible to

tion of

e chil-

belov-

n. The

is little

neigh-

Himsels:

which arises, renders the parrots so giddy, that they fall down intoxicated, and become an easy prey to their pursuers, who immediately seize them, tie the feet and wings, and recover them by simply throwing water upon their heads."

The mystery was now unravelled; it was no longer difficult to account for an accident which had proved so fatal to our islanders; but alas! the discovery of the cause did not diminish the calamity.

At break of day they descended from the rock and returned to the spot where once their belove habitation had stood. Instead of it they beheld heap of smoking ashes! no furniture! no books no shelter! they must forego all.

In the mean while the fire raged with violent in the forest; at the end of twelve days it was no extinguished, and would undoubtedly have confumed the whole island, had the forest been adjucent to others; but it was absolutely alone, forming a sort of thicket in the midst of an imment

plain : carried confeq

Duriolving determine muche isla making tourited table tented ion for voidal vas str nore

outh 1

ounte

urnitu n it de

nenkourite

plain

plain: besides, the wind blowing from the north, carried the flakes of fire upon the cabin only, and onsequently towards the sea.

During thefe twelve days, the Colonel was reolving in his mind different plans, and was unletermined which to purfue. He faw plainly that e must build another habitation if he remained in he island: but he did not stop here: the idea of naking his escape from it had long been the faourite subject of his meditations; he had coneived a project which he believed to be practiable though hazardous, and nothing had preented his putting it into execution, but his affecion for Eleanor and Ambrose, whose extreme outh had hitherto rendered them less able to enounter the dangers and fatigues that must unvoidably attend the enterprize; but now that he vas stripped of all, that he found himself once nore on the island without habitation, without urniture, without any thing to render his abode n it desirable, he began again to revolve his faimment ourite project. " If it were possible," faid he to himself, moke , that

n eafy feize

r them

. 11 was no

which as! the e cala-

e rock belove beheld

books

violend was no ave con-

een adja ie, form

plain

himself, "to construct a canoe. My tools can eter; not be confumed, I shall find them among the ashes. If, I fay, it were possible in this canoe to er of the gain the islands inhabited by Europeans! The ect, co Antilles form a half circle, so that if we missed one on sequ we should unavoidably arrive at another; Cuba, e fury St. Domingo, Jamaica, any of those islands would tal to facilitate our return to England. What a de. "But lightful restection! But, may we not," said he, en the recollecting himself, "fall into the hands of the sided of Carribes, by whom we are to all appearance furrounded? My own life I have a right to risk, but ought I to expose to flavery, to the dangers of shipwreck, two unfortunate children, for whom erock Heaven has rendered me responsible?" The Colonel rested some time on this idea; but the hope of feeing England, and of restoring to society two beings whose hearts and manners he had formed, in the end prevailed, and he resolved to hazard all rather than give up an enterprize that flattered him with fuch pleasing prospects.

His plan well digested, he communicated it to

Peter;

g, rer " I a ow ve ould n

" Do Colo should

steer t

" But uld w

tilles

can- eter; but this wary domestic, far from approvng the ng, remonstrated with his master upon the dannoe to er of the enterprize "Ah, Sir," faid he, "rect, consider, I befeech you, what will be the ed one confequence, should we again expose ourselves to Cuba, he fury of an element that has already proved fo would tal to us."

"But, Peter," faid the Colonel, "you have en the construction of a canoe; you have even ided one?"

"I agree, Sir," faid Peter, "that I have; I k, but low very well how to work a canoe; I hope I ers of would not fink you: nay, I could perhaps shun crocks—but still it is necessary to know where fleer to."

> "Do not be alarmed about that, Peter," faid Colonel: we can steer towards St. Domingo, should we miss that, we shall find other of the tilles inhabited by Europeans."

"But the Carribes, Sir," faid Peter, "think, uld we fall into their hands!"

" True,

ed it to

The

a de-

id he,

of the

ce fur-

whom

Colo-

rope of ty two

ormed,

zard all

lattered

Peter;

"True, Peter," faid the Colonel," but you know the Isle of Friz: we can avoid that."

"But, Sir," faid Peter, "we are undoubtedly furrounded by the Carribes."

"Heaven," interrupted the Colonel, "will protect us; deprived of all that has hitherto renders our abode in this island tolerable, we have only melancholy alternative." More he said to the purpose, till Peter, overcome at length by arguments and importunities, consented to embassin an enterprize of which he clearly foresawa the dangers; more perhaps than really existed for being himself ignorant of geography or navigation, he beheld the success of the voyage amuch more uncertain than the Colonel.

The children leaped for joy; the pleasure of going on the sea, of seeing strange countries, red dered them blind to the perils they were to a counter; they saw only the end of the voyage without bestowing a thought on the accidents the might interrupt it.

The enterprize being resolved upon, they

in to em, a

liness

on a

e coco

rous,

thout do

ipped of the

rk that

n rema

e two

ned up

furface

canoe:

in to remove the ashes, and seek for their tools, hich they happily found in a state fit to make e of, excepting that it was necessary to whet em, and to make new handles, which was the finess of three days. The next object was to on a tree calculated for the purpose of conucting a canoe; and after much deliberation, e cocoa-tree, of all the island produced, was eferred; not only on account of its enormous e, but of the nature of its wood, which is foft, rous, and easy to work. One of these trees was thout loss of time rooted up, the trunk cut to out the length of fifteen feet, and the bark ipped of. It was then put upon the stocks, and th the help of fire and hatchet hollowed, a rk that was very long and laborious. The botn remained flat, and the fides four feet high I fifteen inches thick, inclined rather inward. e two extremities, lengthened into a point, ned up a little, that the vessel might the more ly tack about. Our workmen then scraped furface with flints, and thus compleated their

t you

ll pro

loubt

only a

y argue

esawa existed

or navi

easure o

ere to e

idents th

, they

canoe, which when finished was fifteen feet long fix wide, and four deep. A mast and rigging w next to be added, but this was not the most dis cult part of the work: a strong branch w the mizzen mast; rushes woven into a mat ma fails, and the leaves of the palm tree twifted h came strong and solid cordage. As our carpe ters had neither iron nor nails, the whole we lity o joined with tenons and mortises, and fixed wi wooden pegs. Peter did not forget to remi his mafter that the negroes fasten to the sides both d their canoes strong cables, that may be stretch horizontally in case of need. "To these, Si faid he, "as I have before told you, they themselves, that when the tempest agitates he mor canoe, or causes it to turn over, they may foll the revolutions of their barks. The Color took the same precaution, and at the end of month the little bark was finished, and noth remained but to lanch it; a work which performed with great eafe; for the Colonel, ing taken care to fix rollers under his stocks eans ( the f rk fw Defti , -ou s emp re it n grea

e to th ing. Their c ded it, n at h ns.

> To-m island; caprici

may, p

long cans of a capitan the whole was gradually moved the fea, where the rollers were lost and the t diff

Destitute of tools necessary for the undertakat many, our reader must judge of the activity that ted be semployed to root up, cut, shape, hollow, carped of polish a tree of an immense size. The posole we lity of effecting it might even be doubted, ed will re it not known that diligence and resolution great mafters which furmount obstacles, fides both difficulties, and render every thing pofstretch e to the man who is enterprising and perfeefe, Sin they heir departure was fixed for the eighth day he month of May. On the evening that preay fell led it, the Colonel made the two children sit e Colo in at his fide and spoke to them in these ns.

To-morrow, my dear pupils, we shall leave which island; to-morrow we shall resign ourselves donel, acapticious element in pursuit of man: alas! may, perhaps, one day regret the peaceful

me

end of

d noth

Rocks

ng wa

h w

remi

country in which you have till now lived foha You may one day reproach me with ha ing caused you to forfake it. No matter; I my duty, if, as I trust, my confidence in this terprise is a secret counsel of that benign Be who has hitherto watched over you. Man. children, is not formed to live alone; he m carry his imperfections into fociety, that hem feel them, and learn that humility which alone arise from a sense of his weakness. cluded from the world, we are apt to ascrib ourselves a perfection which does not belong human nature, and forget that we are called by the Great Author of our Being to combat to conquer passions, of the influence of which are alone infensible, because strangers to the jects that would excite them. Can we, for ample, assure ourselves that we are exempts the fordid passion of avarice, when no object presented to excite our cupidity? Can we's tain the conquest we have gained over our our progress in patience and forbearance

e are ciety arfely

d the

ol an

cure i focie adicti

hich a

nt ple

ey wil

propo

cating joyme

draw u, that certain rfelves

work

means ith ha er; I 1 thise gn Bei Man, he m at hen which ess. afcrib belong calledu combati f which s to the we, for xemptf no obje an wea ver our rance b fo ha

e are contradicted? No, my children; it is in ciety alone that we can form a just estimate of irselves; self-love may indeed delude us, but a ol and impartial examination of our actions, d the motives from whence they fpring, will cure us from yielding implicitly to its dictates. fociety, my children, you will meet with condictions, anxieties, and a variety of cares from hich a life of folitude would exempt you; but not discouraged; you will experience equivant pleasures; your hearts will dilate in the ought that you do not exist for yourselves alone; ey will expand in love to all around you, and proportion as your opportunities of commucating happiness encrease, your own sources of joyment will multiply: but let me not, while draw this inviting picture, forget to remind u, that the fuccess of our purposed voyage is certain; we are on the point of committing rselves to the caprice of the ocean, in a bark work of our unskilful hands:—our rout is by means certain. The Antilles, 'tis true, are numerous; if we mifs one, I trust we shall arriverley at another; but many of them are inhabited h the Carribes, and I need not repeat the confer a di quence, should we fall into their hands. It not make these observations, my children, todi se of courage you; no, my own hopes are frong; theva besides founded upon rational and solid ground palm but I would recall to your young minds, too for elated with the prospect of success, the necess reflection, that our enterprise is in the hands God, to whose decrees, whether they tend prosper or frustrate it, 'tis our duty to submit wi pious and chearful refignation."

Ambrose and Eleanor listened with attention the discourse of their friend, and in silence life up their hearts to the Supreme Being, and in plored his protection. They then with renew efume vigor fet about conveying on board their lit bark, the few articles that had been present from the conflagration. Among these were the tools, and a Carribee cafket, containing for jewels, and the letter and articles found in

eart,

alfo

at he

tle c xt da he Co

e fucc

ltance now

mself, m, esp

have f

ves!

od," fa

a, "p meto

nt of

Derle

erley. These last the Colonel had so much at ell arriv bited heart, from the hope that they might one day lead a discovery of Ambrose and Eleanor's parents, e confe at he secured them about his own person, in n, toda ife of shipwreck or other accident. They laid ; they also a store of rush matting and cordage made palm leaves, and thus having completed their ground too for the cargo, retired to rest in expectation of the necessar at day, which was to be that of their departure. he Colonel could not close his eyes all night; e success of his approaching voyage, which at a mit wi flance hope had represented nearly as a certainnow appeared doubtful; he feared, not for tention mielf, but for those who were to accompany in, especially for the children; "they," faid he, have scarcely entered the morning of life, and I renew estume to expose them to the caprices of the ves! to the dangers of shipwreck! Gracious present od," said he, looking with fervour toward hea-, " protect them !- but if they must perish, fufwere the me to perish with them; let me share the punishning for ound up at of a crime of which I alone shall be guilty."

Derle

s. 14

hands

tend

nce lift

, and in

heir lit

Thefe

These reflections were nevertheless counterpoise the proby others more pleafing; he still flattered himsel and w with arriving at a port of fafety, and the though against of returning to England, once more hulled him might a pleasing delusion. From this he was, at length roused by the return of light: the Sun gilt the though tops of the mountains, and he arose in haste; but den, A the children and Peter had been before hand with treated him and were amusing themselves with carrying their d into the vessel different forts of grain, salted fil and other provisions that were previously prepare onel; ed, and, undoubtedly, very needful to undertake with re voyage, the term of which was uncertain. On thing, however, which had till now escaped the thing t recollection, caused some embarrassment: the we ha was means to carry fresh water, which was equal meannecessary as the other part of their stores. The his, h difficulty was, however, foon furmounted by Poplanat ter, who presently formed with planks, in the boundight in tom of the vessel, a reservoir for the purpose. I knowi prevent the filtrations, he stopped the joints will running leaves dipped in a fort of refinous gum which he alk his rpoile the property of being impenetrable to the water, himfel and when filled, closed it very exactly, to defend it though against the motion of the bark, which he feared himi might drive out the water. In the water and the water and the water length In two hours all was ready, and nothing was gilt to hought on but fetting fail, when on a fudste; bu den, Ambrose seeming to recollect himself, ennd with treated the Colonel for a few minutes to delay carrying their departure.

In t "V " N

Ited file "With all my heart, Ambrose," said the Coprepar lonel; "but tell me, do you leave your island lertake with regret?"

n. 00

"No, father," faid Ambrose, "we have noped the thing to regret, fince we take you with us; but ent: the we have forgotten—Eleanor, you know what I as equal mean—come with me—quick, quick." Saying es. The his, he took her hand, and without further exed by Paplanation, set off across the plain, and was out of n the bought in an instant. If the Reader is desirous of pose. I knowing whither Eleanor and her brother were pints will running with fo much precipitation, he need only which he ask his heart, and he will strongly suspect it was to the tomb of their good friend Derley. " Oh, yes," faid Eleanor, as they ran across the plain, " indeed, we forgot; it was very ungrateful in us not to think of taking a last farewel of him." They prefently arrived at the grave, upon which, as a small memorial, they had placed large ftones, formething in the form of a tomb. Here, with full hearts, they proftrated themselves, hand in hand, and began feveral phrases which they could not finish. "Farewel, farewel, Derley," fail they. " Poor Derley! we shall never fee you more, but we will always think of you. Poor Derley! There he lies, fifter."-" Yes, brother, he will be always there-Farewel, Derley, farewel, we will always remember you .-Yes, Eleanor and Ambrose will keep you always in their hearts!"

Having thus given free course to their gratitude, they 'rose to return to the sea-shore, when on a sudden they started back, struck with a noile entirely new to them. They looked at each other: the noise was repeated: "It is a clap of thunders turne repeathem, on the and of found brose, he know the special are callength

ran pi

stead o

procee

that le

left the spot,

still on friends

thund

es Oh, plain, eful in him." which, ftones, , with and in y could ," faid ee you Poor s, bro-I, Deryou.-

ir grati

always at each

thunder

hunder, brother," faid Eleanor. "No," returned he, " it is not thunder." The noise was repeated a third time; their knees bent under them, and Eleanor funk without fense or motion on the turf. While Ambrose was supporting her, and endeavouring to recall her fenses, confused founds of distant voices, caught his ear, "Ambrose, Eleanor," was repeated more than once: he knew not what to do; he would have run from the spot, but affection to his sister with-held him. "Rife, rife, my dear Eleanor," faid he, "we are called; it is the voice of our father;" but some time elapsed before her senses returned. At length, supporting her as well as he could, he ran precipitately toward the sea-shore; but inflead of going to that fide from whence the voice proceeded, by a natural impulse he took a path that led to that part of the shore where they had left the Colonel and Peter. They arrived at the pot, but they were not there; their vessel was still on the waves, but no other trace of their friends remained. Ambrose and Eleanor were too F 6 much much alarmed to form any fettled ideas; they ran light! here and there, repeatedly calling Father! l'eterl lay on and invoking Heaven to hear and pity their anxie been ty. A cluster of rocks at length set some bound corres to their despair. "Brother," faid Eleanor, "it rous p strikes me that we shall find them among the hrick rocks." "Heaven grant that we may," faid Am and A brofe. The path they took winding, by de had for degrees brought them to an eminence, from proofs whence their view comprehending a larger extent cions. of the ocean, they discerned a small vessel sail the ha ing from the island with the greatest rapidity, and so This fight encreased their grief; they doubted and m not but that their friends were in the veffel, and lings, that the Carribes, or other enemies, had forced nation them from the island. Immovable with grief, culars their eyes swimming in tears, they remained upon fears of the rock till the bark had totally disappeared, and then bursting a-new into a flood of forrows, de was n scended with heavy steps by a winding path, which Eleand brought them imperceptibly to a part of the short the jo at some distance from that where they had ascended: but what a spectacle of horror struck their

er, h

heir f

y ran

uck their

fight

ight! a disfigured corpfe, covered with blood, Peter ay on the fands! the upper jaw and skull had anxie been carried away; but the height and clothes bound corresponding, they doubted not but their gener, "it rous protector lay extended before them. Eleanor thek hrieked, and again fell fenfeless on the ground, id Am and Ambrose reduced almost to the same state, by the had scarcely strength or courage to search for from proofs to destroy or confirm their dreadful suspiextent cions. His heart revived, upon observing that el fail the hands of the unfortunate victim were small apidity, and foft, whereas those of his friend were hard, doubted and much fun-burnt; the Colonel wore no stockfel, and ings, the deceased did; and upon a close examiforced nation, he found that their clothes in many partih grief, culars differed. As for honest Peter, he had no ned upon fears on his account, as besides being much smalred, and er, he was habited in skins. Convinced that it ows, de was neither the Colonel nor Peter, he flew to h, which Eleanor, who began to revive, and communicated the short the joyful intelligence; but the idea of its being d ascend their friend, had so strongly impressed her mind, that out what a speciment of hereby to that it was not till after she had repeatedly questioned her brother, and examined the proofs, that the could be perfuaded her fuspicions were unfounded. For further fatisfaction, Ambrose fearched the pockets of the deceased, and found in them a pocket-book, knife, pipe, and other articles, which they well knew their friend did not posses. This removed every doubt: tears of joy mingled with those of woe were shed on both fides; it was not their friend; the dreadful certainty of his being no more was removed; and hope, if it did not speak peace to their hearts, at least suspended the violence of their grief. They began to discourse with more calmness on what had happened, and attempted to form fome conjectures on thecause of their misfortune. At the fide of the deceafed they found a weapon, which, by the description they had heard, they judged to be a pistol. This they concluded had deprived him of life, but all beyond was a mystery they could not penetrate. Tired with conjecture, they were turning from the melancholy spot, when Ambrofe Amb fary, tunat friend him t taugh to pra woode in the infinit They the fh recalle newed to give on the were ] Eleano fhe, "

the Ma

Ambro

nefthat unrofe nd in r arl not fjoy both cerand ts, at They what con-At the which, ged to prived y they e, they when

mbrofe

Ambrose observed to his fifter, that it was necesfary, in some way or other, to dispose of the unfortunate man before them. "Whether he were a friend or an enemy, Eleanor," faid he, " we owe him the duties of humanity: this was a lesson taught us by our dear father, and shall we neglect to practife it?" He then went in pursuit of a wooden spade, and presently returning, dug a hole in the fand, in which, affifted by Eleanor, he with infinite toil and difficulty deposited the corpse. They then, hand in hand, took their way along the shore: the fight of their little bark, at length, recalled the remembrance of their friend, and renewed the violence of their grief; they stopped to give vent to their tears, and then fitting down on the point of a rock, they for some minutes were lost in melancholy reflections: at length Eleanor broke filence: "I am persuaded," said she, " that the Carribes have forced them from the illand." "There is more reason," returned Ambrose, " to think that it was other enemies; the the man whom we have just buried is not a Carribe; he is dressed like our father."

"True," faid Eleanor, "but a thought has struck me; perhaps, like Peter, he has been made prisoner by the Carribes; it is very possible that he may have lost his life in the defence of our dear father."

Ambrose paused a moment upon this idea. "What you suggest, sister," said he, "is certainly possible; the unfortunate man we have seen may have lost his life in defence of our father, but the vessel we saw was certainly very different from the canoes of the Carribes."

"It certainly" faid Eleanor, "appeared very different; but the distance was great, our eyes might deceive us; for my part, I scarcely knew what I felt or what I saw."

"That is true," faid Ambrose; "but yet I am satisfied, from the description I have heard from my father, that what we saw was a European vessel."

yes them a

. " B

accusto

. .. V

Europ

with endure

now fe

brose,

Peter t

Ab

spent i

night t

the cav

their g

" A

t I courfec

66 But

aggrav:

thousas

Car-

has made

that dear

idea.

feen other, ferent

very

knew

yet I heard

Euro-

es But

"But the Carribes," faid Eleanor, "are so accustomed to land upon this island."

"Well," interrupted Ambrose, "Carribes or Europeans, would to Heaven they had taken us with them! For my part, I would rather have endured slavery, nay, death itself, than what I now feel."

"And so would I," said Eleanor. "Oh, Ambrose, our dear father! can we ever forget him!

Peter too——"

A burst of sorrow concluded. The day was spent in lamentations and vain conjectures, and at night they returned with slow and heavy steps to the cave, which, since the conflagration had served them as an abode. Here every object reminded them of their loss, and renewed the violence of their grief; here their dear protector had discoursed with them; here they had partaken with him the last meal; they wept, they recollected a thousand instances of his kindness, which did but aggravate their forrow. At length, nature exhausted, called for repose; Eleanor sunk into an

uneafy

uneafy flumber; Ambrose did the same, but prefently started from it, and began again to ponder upon the dreadful events of the preceding day; his thoughts hurried from one thing to another, till an idea occurred which fixed effectually his attention, and revived his hopes. He impatiently waited for the return of day, that he might communicate it to his fifter, who no fooner awaked than he addressed her in these words: "What can it avail us, fifter, to remain in an island where every object reminds us of the happiness we have loft? Our bark is, you know, ready, it is rigged, flored, every thing is complete. What hinders us from putting to fea? If we remain here, we must for ever give up the hope of feeing our dear father again; whereas, if we venture to fea, it is possible we may arrive at some island, where we may hear tidings of him."

"But," said Eleanor, starting at so daring an enterprize, we do not know how to guide a canoe—and then the Carribes—"

"As to the guiding of a canoe," said Ambrose, have ribes,

Europ

" I h

well t

44 7

fire to you be death, dear C

"wer fucces the isl

"I

obstac imagi

may n

"I fe

"I have heard Peter describe it so often, that I have no fears upon that head; and as to the Carribes, we must avoid them; we, as well as my father, know the islands that are inhabited by the Europeans, and can easily steer toward them."

"Yes," faid Eleanor, "we know them very well upon the map, but when one is upon the great ocean"—

"Well fifter," faid Ambrose, "I do not defire to force you, but for my part, as I have told you before, I would rather endure slavery or even death, than this dreadful uncertainty upon our dear Carlton's fate."

"I would risque every thing," said Eleanor, "were there a hope of discovering him; but our success is very uncertain; we may never reach the islands inhabited by Europeans, and if we do, may not—"

"Well," interrupted Ambrose, provoked at the obstacles his sister raised to a project upon which his imagination, already began to be much heated. "I see that you are averse to what I propose."

"You

ently comaked Vhat where have gged, pre-

nder

his

till

dear it is e we

, we

ng an ide a

brose,

flary to every enterprife, without thele-

"You cannot furely think, brother," faid Eleanor, "that I am averse to any thing that can afford a reasonable hope of seeing again our dear father. But we incur certain danger in this enterprise, and after all, our success is very uncertain; if we escape the Carribes, and the dangers of the sea, we may not gain the information we wish."——

"I agree, my dear sister," said Ambrose, "that it is possible our enquiries may not prove successful: but on the other hand, there is rational grounds to suppose that they may. The vessel which conveyed our friends from the island was undoubtedly European; it is therefore highly probable, that among Europeans we may find them. Cuba, St. Domingo, Porto Rico, and the other islands inhabited by Europeans, lie near to, and without doubt, have a communication with each other; if we reach one, we shall easily extend our enquiries to others, and it will be hard indeed if we do not somewhere gain the intelligence we seek. Courage and perseverence, sister, our de effecte

are n

nor, l thoug hope

really

of?"

"

"I dencous fifter, father lofs, have fection and I enco

very,

the d

are necessary to every enterprise; without these, our dear father has often told us, nothing can be effected, and with them, that few things are impossible."— lea-

af-

lear

en-

cer-

gers

1 We

that

cess-

ional

veffel

was

ighly

find

d the

ar to,

with

y ex-

hard

ntelli-

fifter,

are

"And do you really think, brother," faid Eleanor, half-perfuaded to liften to a project, which though it at first alarmed her, held out the soothing hope of recovering their lost friends, "Do you really think we may reach the islands you speak of?"

"I am persuaded that we may," said Ambrose, "I do not pretend to suppose that we are not to encounter dangers and difficulties; but, my dear sister, had circumstances been reversed, had my father's fate been ours, and he left to lament our loss, do you think dangers or dissiculties would have retarded his pursuit? No, be assured his affection would have surmounted every obstacle; and shall we, who owe all to his goodness, fear to encounter the perils of the sea, or, perhaps, slavery, (for this is the worst that can happen) when the delightful hope, however distant, is afforded of

feeing

feeing him and sharing, if we cannot alleviate, his misfortune? Recollect, my dear sister, with what tenderness he has watched over our infancy, how studious he has been to cultivate our minds, and train our hearts to virtue! Reslect upon the many——"

"Say no more, brother," interrupted Eleanor, upon whose feelings this last argument operated more powerfully than all the rest, "I am ashamed of my fears, and will from this moment be wholly guided by your advice. God will, I trust, grant us his protection, and guide us to our dear father, our best, our only friend."

Such was the discourse of Eleanor and Ambrose before they left the cave. They then sell upon their knees, emplored the protection of the Supreme Being, and walked toward the sea shore, discoursing upon their project. The Sun was by this time risen, and the sea calm, and reslecting, in its various undulations, the purple colours of the sirmament, seemed to invite their considence, and engage them to embark. They stopped a few methat far away I fly from to the his fifte y arifin fea, and riew.

fortitud

d: thich ligh, a roachin nore th

great ndeavor o dang

is effort ountena

me ope

few

the nor, ated nolly grant ther,

his

f the hore, as by Ling, urs of dence, ped a few

Am-

few minutes; entered the vellel, and cut the cable that fastened it to the shore. In an instant it shot away like an arrow. Eleanor, feeing the shore fly from her, shrieked, and would have returned to the island; but Ambrose, affecting the greatest fortitude, employed all his eloquence to encourage his fifter, and at last succeeded. A wind presentvarifing from land, drove them into the open lea, and their beloved ifle foon vanished from their iew. The Sun, in the mean while, had run nore than half his course, and the weather, which ad till now been favourable, on a fudden changd: thick clouds obscured the air, the sea ran igh, and some drops of rain threatened an aproaching storm; all nature seemed to prepare for great revolution. Ambrose, though alarmed, ideavoured, by every argument he could fuggest, encourage and perfuade his fifter there was danger, but the horror, which, in spite of is efforts to appear serene, was impressed on his buntenance, and the gulf, which from time to me opened and threatened to fwallow them, fpoke spoke too forcibly not to be understood. Eleanor. nevertheless, encouraged by the example of her brother, fummoned all the resolution she was miltress of, and resolved, if it were the will of God that they should perish, to meet death with fortitude. The weather, however, which continued foul till the middle of the night, at length cleared, and gave place to the Moon, which, reflecting her filver disk upon the waves, somewhat re-animated the courage of our poor voyagers, more embarraffed on the liquid element, than were heretofore, the first navigators. But on a sudden a new object excited their terrors. On the top of their mast shone a light, which to their trouble imagination, feemed fire descending from heaven to consume their vessel. This, though an appear ance familiar to mariners, and the natural confe quence of a heated and damp atmosphere, struc them with inconceivable horror. They classe each other closely, and fixing their eyes upon electric flame, had neither power to weep 10 speak. Nor was this all; the sea still ran high Sometime and the d

waves

The fcarce taking forded wind which, but on tunning their base of land the itlan from be est confi being or to hear i

Sometimes their little bark 'role upon the billows, and then again seemed to fink, never to rife, into the depth of the vast ocean. Death every instant presented itself to their view, and they could only wonder that they had not already met it in the waves.

Thirty hours they remained in this anxiety, scarcely daring to stir, and only from necessity taking a little of the nourishment their vessel afforded. At length, near the close of the day, the wind changing carried them toward a coast, which, on the first view, appeared to be defert; but on approaching it, they diftinguished men running in crowds upon the fands, to examine their bark. Their hearts rebounded at the fight of land; they perceived by the drefs and colour of the illanders, that they were not Carribes, and far from being alarmed, were inspired with the greatest considence. They rejoiced at the prospect of being once more fafe upon land, and hoped foon to hear news of the Colonel and Peter, as if, (fuch

ometime

her mif

not,

God forti-

inued

eared, ng her e-ani-

more were fudden the top

rouble

heaven appear

al confe

, struc y claspe

upon th

veep no

ran high

was their simplicity) all the world was obliged mend quefflons to them, and feemed to be much of

When they were near land, a little boat took them on board, and carried them on shore: but the aftonishment of the islanders upon finding two children habited in skins, alone, in a bark ingenioully constructed and furnished with different forts of provision, is not easy to be described; a thoufand questions were in an instant put to them, to which they answered in English, have you seen Colonel Carlton or Peter? Where are they? la pity tell us, we are feeking them, &c.

The islanders, who were Spaniards, understood nothing of all this; but one among them, who knew English, acted as interpreter, and answered by affuring them that they knew nothing of the persons of whom they spoke.

The noise of their arrival, and the singular cucumstances that attended it, foon reached the ears of the Governor, to whose palace they were conducted amidst a croud of people, whom curiosty had drawn together. ot min oldas illa Fire

The

The C

veral qu

eased v

ofe and

ard, a

nething

de a pa

, in v

nds:

uld abi

giving

length,

le them

a. ...

able an

; I ma

have ef

Yo Yo

no rea

or this

h, I w

make

The Governor viewed them with furprize, put veral questions to them, and seemed to be much ased with their youth and simplicity. ofe and Eleanor, giddy with all they faw and rd, answered only in monosyllables, or by nething in which the Colonel or Peter always de a part. The Governor, who spoke Eng-, in vain affured them he did not know their m, to ends: folely occupied with the idea, they ald absolutely insist upon his knowing him, y? lo giving them the information they wished. length, after repeated questions, the Governor erstood de them sit down, and addressed them to this a, who de. "My children, you appear to me to be fwered able and wife; I am Sovereign of this island of the ch is called St. Verado, one of the Lucaye ; I made a discovery of it twelve years since, have established in it a colony, of which I am f. You shall remain at my Court, and shall ere conor this Colonel, who feems to interest you fo h, I will cause him to be sought; do not

G 2

iged

took but

two geniforts

thou-

1 seen

Henett

lar cu-

the ears

curiolity

The

make your felves inleafy, you fhall have news desihim thorty. Poor children! how old are you bject. alq of he plates, the meats, the furnite work wove of

Ambrose replied, " We are almost fifteen lothes

And what is your name?" faid the Gon wonde simb dmire, they had not leifure to cat, and fearerly

"I am called Ambrofe." up ant of busting patter er being at length ended, aren's uoy bak se have hinus Eleanor. De Meditioner et obsen amot nige ng in f

"Well, Eleanor," faid the Governor, "a wo near me: are vou afraid? have I an ill look pacqu

"No," faid Eleanor. "Well then," to enture nued he, "draw near: you will be very he with the here, and you too, Ambrofe." Isdi sansfind umftan

A superb supper was now served up, do the hi which the Governor lavished on his youngg el Carl the most flattering attentions, especially Eleanor, with whose beauty and artless wer he appeared much delighted. Eleanor and and the brofe eat but little; though much comfort hey be r the Governor's promises in behalf of their fi they could not forget that they had loft him live; and

the

des, their attention was wholly engroffed by the are vo bjects that furrounded them : the wax lights, he plates, the meats, the furniture, and then the freen lothes of the islandors! all struck them with Gor wonder and delight. They could only gaze and dmire, they had not leifure to eat, and scarcely assist pattend to the questions of the Governor. Supaird of er being at length ended, and a few hours havni min in fome meafure familiarized the furroundor, and wonders, the Governor requested Ambrose look pacquaint him more particularly with his adentures. He complied, and acquitted himself very he with the best grace imaginable; omitted no cirasthmut umstance that was in the least interesting; spoke the highest terms of their obligations to Coloel Carlton; extolled the fidelity of Peter, and oncluded with describing the manner in which rtless hey were deprived of their friends, their grief, nd the happiness they should experience could hey be restored to them.

> The Governor thanked Ambrose for his narrawe; and observing that rest was necessary after

> > the

G. 3.

up, du oungg

cially or and

omforte

their fr oft him

65 21

the fatigues they had undergone, ordered each to be conducted to a separate apartment. The thought of a separation, situated as they were among strangers and in a strange land, bexcited painful sensation, but propriety rendered it needs fary, and they submitted. In the morning, however, at day-break, Ambrose hastened to his side apartment; she was already up, and when he saw her brother, melted in tears?

"What is the matter, my dear fifter?" fait every thing here alarms me: I am afraid we shall be very unhappy."

"Why do you think fo?" faid Ambrofe.

there is fomething in this Governor that terrifes me very much. He is not like our dear Carl toh. "Jodgwood rangers dealer with revite and so of what do you apprehend?" show had vincenped a anoth I don't know," faid Eleanor; " but when ever l

3 46 ]

is abli the G us hop desire are no

" I drying is fom

vessel.

" that nor ma on tha treache man na is frequ

and ma

to us th

ever

ever he speaks, or looks at me, I cannot help be conducted to a foograte apartiliguildment

"Nay, my dear fifter," faid Ambrofe, "that is abfurd; there is at present no cause for alarm; the Governor treats us with kindness, and gives us hopes of feeing our dear father; what can we defire more? Besides, let the worst happen, if we are not happy here, we can embark again in our veffel." Mar per me had

"I am, indeed, very foolish," said Eleanor, drying her tears, "but you must allow that there is fomething very forbidding in the countenance we shall of this Governor."

> "I agree with you, fifter," faid Ambrofe, "that Don Lescar has neither the countenance nor manners of our dear Carlton; but we are not on that account to conclude that he is base or treacherous: how often has our father described' to us the diversity which reigns throughout human nature; he has told us that a corrupt heart is frequently hid under a pleasing set of features; and may we not equally infer, that a good one

t what

each to

The

y were

cited

nedel-

z, how-

s filter

hen de

vellel

?" faid

drying.

mee bu

fe.

, " bu

terrifies

r Carl

in au 01.

es but

is frequ

structure song, the center of which was a spacious square, dashar, the center of which was a spacious square,

In this manner, though himself not prepossesfed in favour of their hoft, did Ambrose endeavour to calm the fears of his fifter. While he was thus engaged, a fervant came to conduct them to Don Lescar, who received them with great kind. ness, and excited their confidence by a thousand flattering promises: Eleanor's tranquillity was restored; but the Governor observing on her's, as well as her brother's countenance, the traces of melancholy and dejection, ordered one of his of ficers to flew them the city, wishing to diffipate their fadness, and at the same time to impress them with an exalted idea of his magnificence. They accordingly fet out under the conduct of their guide, and were much amused with observing the variety which reigned in the persons, dress, and buildings of the islanders: every thing was to them new and interesting. The houses, only one story high, were built with wood and bricks made of a fort of reddish earth found in the mountains; the ftreed a sta

be feet

men, which

fide of great

With

Baytia from

play ?

history

The

minut

about was w

the ho

east,

the

the streets long, spacious, and regularly built, formed astar, the center of which was a spacious square, describing an exact pentagon. No shops were to be seen in the island; the inhabitants, to the number of about sour hundred, as many men as women, lived upon the produce of a little field, which each cultivated behind his house. At the side of Don Lescar's palace was a chapel, in which was an old Dominican, who was held in great veneration by the whole island, presided. With respect to the morals and customs of this Baytian colony, the reader will soon learn them from the mouth of an inhabitant, who will play an interesting part in the sequel of this history.

The island was situated about the 25th degree 15 minutes north latitude, and 57 degrees 12 minutes west longitude. It might be in length about six leagues, and in breadth three: nothing was wanting to neatness, convenience, or utility: the houses were built along the sea-coast to the east, where a port was formed, well fortised.

the

ntc-

ffef-

vour

Was

m to

cind-

ifand

Was

her's,

es of

is of

lipate

press

cence.

ua of bferv-

drefs,

was to

ly one

made

tains;

wit h

with a tower and ramparts. 13 Here Eleanor and Ambrole flooped, while the officer, their guide, withdrew to converse at some distance with friend whom he had met. They fat down, and fixing their eyes upon their little bark, which remained chained in the bafin, began to call to their remembrance the happy hours they had fpent with their protector, when a little old man, with a long white beard, came and feated himself beside them: he looked stedfastly on them for some minutes, and then broke silence:-" Amiable, interesting children," faid he, "fuffer an old man, whose head is white with age, to behold and converse with you: from the first moment I faw you on the port, your youth, your innocence, your misfortunes interested me : As I view you, my heart expands: speak, amiable children, who gave you birth ?"bam ore solimon

"We are ignorant," replied Ambrose; din our infancy we were deserted in an uninhabited island: God sent us a father, a protector; he brought us up and instructed us; but we have just lo

the old fide and bit the

and A

July 1

man,

divide "B

dren:

promisin his wife;

it was

just

just lost him, and set out determined to seek him all over the world, when chance brought us to your country? be another at some of world with the second of world in the second of wor

and

ride.

thoa

and

hich

all to

had

old

eated

them

:e:-

· fuf-

age,

e first

yout

a As

niable.

1111019

affin

abited

r; he

have

just

"How I pity you, my good children!" faid the old man, "how I lament that you must reside among men so wicked as those which inhabit this island!"

and Ambrose, alarmed.

"I tell you, my children," replied the olds man, "a melancholy truth; nothing but un-bridled licentiousness reigns here; vice and folly divide the wretched inhabitants of St. Verrado."

"But Don Lescar—" interrupted the children: "he has loaded us with kindness—he has promised us his protection."

"Ah! my children," faid the stranger, "his promises are made but to deceive and entangle you in his snares; fatal experience has rendered me wife; suffer me then to warn you of your danger; it was for this I watched a favourable moment to accost you."

a Ambrole and Eleanor thanked the old man for the friendly interest he took in what concerned them, and affured him of their readiness to attend to his counfels at the fame time they could not forbear expressing their furprize that he should continue to refide among fuch wicked people " Alas! my children," faid the stranger, necessity not inclination detains me: would to Heaven ! could abandon this detefted place! but fate has rendered it my prison."-Here the old man feemed for fome moments overwhelmed with grief: then recollecting himfelf, and observing, by the intelligent countenances of his young auditors, the impression his discourse made upon them, he refumed: "I fee, my young friends, that my discourse surprizes you: you know not what to think of it; but the history of our Governor, with which a residence of some years in this island has fully acquainted me, will throw a full light on my fubject. Don Lescar was born of a good family at St. Domingo: being destined from his youth to the fervice of his country, he 124.134 Was fent made and but be Blake his r partly mean South were continued to and the and the and the made and the south south the south and the south south sout

aband

them

them

W25

expe

moft

rapad

hono

ed m

-

for rned rend not rould ople. effity enal e has feemgrief: by the litors, m, he at my hat to in this a full m of a leftined

Was

was fent by the Governor of the island upon an expedition, in which be differed himfelf by the most unheard of excesses; nothing withstood his rapacity; unawed by any principle of justice or honour, by nature avaricious and cruel, he preyed upon the fubstance of the people he was fent to defend; his depredations were at length made known to the Governor; he was tried. and condemned to pay the forfeit of his life; but before the fentence was executed, George Blake, the captain of an English vessel, one of his most zealous partizans, and fome others. partly by force and partly by bribery, found means to fet him at liberty. They failed for South-Carolina; but near the Lake of Bahama were encountered by a violent tempest, which continued eight hours. They then hoisted fail. but the winds proving contrary, and their yard and top-mast being broken, they were obliged to abandon themselves to chance, and at last found themselves near an island, which the pilot assured them was one of the Lucay or Bahama Isles, which which was probably yet unknown to Europe: for though Christopher Columbus discovered forty, it is well known that more exist. While the carpenter purfued his work, Don Lescar, with his friend Blake, and a few others advanced into the isle, which he found to be fruitful, but entirely unfrequented, and wild; immediately the fingular idea of founding a colony flruck him; he communicated it to his friends and to the whole crew, who having left their country to escape the punishment of their crimes, or upon different discontents, unanimously approved it: in short, they took possession of the island, tilled the land, and built commodious habitations: but they had among them no women, and they wanted wives. In this dilemma, Don Lescar, ever fruitful in expedients, recollected the stratagem made use of by the Romans to carry off the Sabine women—but I forget, my children, that you are unacquainted with the history of civilized nations -- "- end the feet was ability deset his intention to be no other, but faulty, ever of our chor.

depart that with car's

E

obfe

on a

then

in th

histo

T

prop

ftrata

ba,

feign

coun

their

numl

of a l

lieved

Eleanor and Ambrose here interrupted him to observe, that though they had been brought up on a desert island, their kind friend had taught them that they were not the only beings existing in the world, and had acquainted them with the history of other countries.

The old man then continued: " Don Lescar proposed to his comrades to make use of the fame stratagem, and they accordingly set fail for Cuba, an island inhabited by the Spaniards. There feigning themselves travellers come to see the country, they one night gave a fête on board their vessel to the women, who assembled to the number of fixty, with fome gentlemen; I was unfortunately among the latter, for in the midst of our gaiety, our perfidious hofts weighed anchor. The wind was favourable, and the veffel departed, while the people on fhore gazed on us with the utmost unconcern, thinking Don Lefcar's defign was merely to afford us the pleasure of a little excursion on the sea; we too at first believed his intention to be no other, but fatally

leanor

e:

red

hile

car,

ned

but

tely

uck

d to

ry to

ipon

d it:

tilled

but

vant-

ever

agem

e Sa-

that

civi-

were

were we undeceived? The veffely which was a swift sailer, in spite of our prayers and tears, conveyed us to this island, never to return. The men, myself only and a sew others, from whom they judged they had nothing to sear, excepted, were all massacred; the women alone, who were the objects of their treachery, were preserved, and those assembled at the scite, being for the most part dissipated and abandoned, easily accommodated themselves to the terms offered by Don Lescar. A sew, however, preserved death to be coming the wives of their base enslavers; and these drag out a miserable existence in the prisons of St. Verrado.

When the inhabitants were furnished with the necessaries, they began to think of the luxuries of life, and George Blake, at the head of an hundred men, put to sea to pillage merchant-men and other vessels; when he meets one superior in force to his own, he housts the white slag, salutes it with three sires, and passes as a friend; but if it has suffered from the tempest, or is inferior, he att bring the di whol thing veffel pairs, of jul and f mean fail, ed for fary t blifhn fince he is longer lony.

may h

ly an drunk

3A

he attacks it; throws out his grappling irons, and brings it in triumph into our port, taking always the cruel precaution to maffacre all the men from whole courage or address he thinks he has any thing to fear; he acts the fame with respect to vessels which unfortunately put in here for repairs, or to take in water: violating every law of justice and hospitality; he murders the men, and feizes upon the women and cargo. By fuchmeans he has collected this little fleet of twenty fail, which you fee in the basin, and has procured for the colony in profusion, all that is necesfary to encourage luxury, and fecure the eftablishment of his colleague. It is feven days fince he fet out upon one of these expeditions; he is not yet returned, and his absence so much longer than usual, begins to alarm the whole colony. It is not improbable but that this villain en and may have met the just punishment of allhis crimes. ior in

> With respect to the Verradians, there is scarcely an excess to which they are not carried; drunkeness reigns indiscriminately amongst them.

> > As

he

25 2

cars,

The

hom

pted,

were

rved.

most

nmo-

Don

o be-

and

rifons

th the

xuries

hun

Calutes

but if

ferior,

As the prizes made by their veffels are divided in the public fquare among the inhabitants, each has a profusion of brandy, and other spiritous liquors, which they employ to their own destruction: even children are infected with this dreadful vice; there are already in the island upwards of two hundred, who, corrupted by the example of their parents, before they have attained the age of reason, lose the little they possess in draughts of brandy. The inhabitants are in continual ftrife, and fometimes kill each other, but this crime is punished with death. They know here no other employment than diffipation, no other God than voluptuousness, and no other restraint than liberty. Thus enervated by idleness and excess, they are not in a state to resist the slightest attack: a hundred men, could they discover and furprize it, would be fufficient to fubdue the whole colony; but Don Lescar has prohibited any one, under pain of death, leaving it without his order or permission. Nor is this all; the velfels you see here are with their boats chained in

The upo

ful to d

fet:

1

thef than ject that view judg confedition habit there they I

the

the basin; and he alone has the key of the chains.

These strong palifades, those guards ready to fire upon the first who shall dare approach, render all access to the port impossible, and when once you seed fet foot in St. Verrado, it is for life.

rds of

ple of

e age

ughts

tinual

t this

v here

other

Araint

is and flight-

(cover ue the

hibited

vithout

he vel-

ined in

the

Ambrose and Eleanor trembled at these dreadful words, which the stranger observing, hastened to divert their attention.

these precautions, is sensible that other chains than those of force are necessary to bind his subjects; he labours to render their state agreeable, that he may add those of inclination; with this view he permits an unrestrained licence, which he judges alone capable of attaching them. To confess the truth, all are satisfied with their condition, and among them there is not a single inhabitant, myself excepted, desirous of quitting St. Verrado to inhabit another country. Every day there are superb entertainments at the palace of the Governor, balls, concerts, and assemblies; they love riots and dissipation; what would they more?

children, are the laws of the Verradians; such their manner of life; endeavour to bear with, and to accommodate yourselves to it, without wandering from the principles of virtue: live here, since heaven has sent you, wise, gentle, modest, temperate, and do not imitate the odious companions with whom you must associate. I will from time to time see, and advise you; persuaded that you will be secret, and set some value on my lessons."

Eleanor and Ambrose astonished and shocked at all they heard, thanked the old man for his information, and expressed their readiness to be guided by his advice. Then seeing their guide, he bade them sarewell, telling them at parting, that he was called the Count d'Oresty.

Don Lescar upon their return, enquired how they liked his city? But observing the impression of melancholy, which, notwithstanding their efforts to appear chearful, the discourse of the Countal Oresty had lest upon their countenances, he expressed his displeasure. Eleanor and Ambrose bro con the eve it.

and

ref

COL

bab

Ho

"a

My

concern they could not help feeling for the loss of their protector. This was the first time they had ever known dissimulation, or felt the necessity of it. And wherefore, I said the Governor, this unavailing forrow? This Carlton was your friend and protector: well, I will be so; I will love and protect you as well as he did; I will do more; I will cause all my subjects to honor and respect you. Besides, a thought has struct me concerning your friend; the manner in which he and Peter disappeared, is singular; I have restected upon it, and do not think it in the least improbable but that you may, in a very short time, see him land in this island."

How? Where? My Lord—do you know?—— Is there any hope of——

"and be not so elate; what I suggest, is merely conjecture; I will tell you upon what grounds: My subjects frequently make short trips upon

the

effion ir efif the

my

ich

and

an-

ere.

left,

pa-

tom

you

ns:"

ed at

for-

rided

bade

at he

(Am-

brole

the feas, for the purpose of taking prizes; it is not eight days fince one of my captains failed with about a hundred and fifty men: now as the time agrees with that in which, by your account, your friends disappeared, it seems very probable that he may have touched at the island, and borne them away to encrease the inhabitants of my colony. Can you describe the corpse you found lying on the ground?"

"No," replied Ambrose, "it was too much disfigured; but we found about it some papers and other articles which I will shew you. Saying this, he searched his pocket, and produced them; but no sooner had Don Lescar examined the papers, than his countenance changed; "Heavens! exclaimed he, what do I see! 'tis the hand writing of my friend! 'tis he himself; the hand of an assassin has divided us for ever." With these words he darted a furious glance upon Ambrose, grasped the papers, and went out of the apartment, without pronouncing a single word.

off caused there to flow; banish him, there-

"W

T

"

who

haps

even

our d

doubt

hope

A days e the thi

ceived fuffere

" fince

who ha

is led he nt ble rne my ind ab zin ach ers ayced ned leaand

and

Vith 133

m-m

the

rd.

The

The children dooked at each other amazed and "What have we done it" faid Eleanor to this ton

- "He thinks," faid Ambrofe, that the man we who was killed upon our coast is his friend." a smit
- "Let us fly," faid Eleanor, alarmed, "per-ov haps he will revenge his death upon us." and that
- "And why fly?" faid Ambrose, "were that even possible, when we may expect soon to see our dear father; he will counsel and defend us.
- "Ah, no," faid Eleanor, "he is without doubt murdered: we can no longer entertain the hope of feeing him."

A deep silence ensued, and they remained overwhelmed with the bitterest reslections. Two days elapsed before they saw the Governor; on the third he sent for them into his apartment; his countenance was gloomy and morose; but he received them with his former kindness. "I have suffered much, my young friends," said he,
"since I saw you; I have shed many tears and it is this Carlton whom you regret so much, who has caused them to slow; banish him, therefore,

fore, from your remembrance, as the enemy of one whom you must henceforth learn to honour and obey."

"Ah, my Lord," faid Eleanor, falling upon her knees, " pardon our dear protector-the injury he has done you was involuntary: in his own defence-Pardon him; Eleanor on her knees entreats it. As a favour-"

"As a favour, fifter," interrupted Ambrole bluntly; " as justice you mean; had Don Lafcar been in the place of our Carlton, would he not have done the fame?"

"Young man," faid Don Lescar, incensed at the oblique reproof that was conveyed to him is thefe words, " moderate your impetuolity; remember that you are in the presence of your King.

"I respect your title," faid Ambrose, "though I know not what is due to it; but I appeal to your heart, to your probity: you believe that our Carlton has destroyed your friend, admitting it to be so, you know not the provocation: WE are

affure and, hono

justif

. .. the de

Do y

66

Amb mon i

166 fmile, judge gion ?

has ta

46 F

" to d

Do Wretch favour

> fure." It n

affured

upon e inn his knees

y of

nour

brofe Lafuld he

nfed at him is v; ref your though peal to that our itting it WE are affured affured it was in defence of his life or liberty, and, in this case, is he not justified? The man of honour should approve the actions that honour justifies." at - siz and faith the law I very date the

"And do you," faid Don Lescar, "bred in the depths of forests, pretend to talk of honour? Do you pretend to know its laws?"

" I know the rights of man toward man," faid Ambrofe," they are equal to all beings, common to all States."

"And fo," faid Don Lescar, with a farcastic fmile, "knowing natural laws, you pretend to judge of those prescribed by civil society and religion? Are thefe the fine maxims your friend has taught you?"

"He has taught me at least," faid Ambrose, "to despise irony, and to brave pride."

Don Lescar was incensed: "Ungrateful wretch," faid he, " is this the return for all my favours? Tremble at the effects of my displeafure."

It must be owned that the fentiments of Ambrose H brose were uttered with an asperity and confidence that cannot be justified: Don Lescar was his fuperior in years, had hospitably entertained him and his fifter, and though the Count d'Oresty had destroyed the confidence they might otherwise have reposed in him, no personal injury had yet been offered; some respect was, therefore, due to him; but bred in unfrequented wilds, accustomed to combat the beasts of the forest, and hardened by labour and fatigue, Ambrose had contracted a certain roughness of character, which rendered him a little favage: he had never been contradicted; on this occasion he was; his heart, replete with the noblest sentiments, could not brook the pride of a man, whom he not only confidered as the enemy of his dearest friend, but degraded by his vices beneath the lowest of his species. Eleanor possessed equal strength of mind with her brother, but she was more timid; every thing alarmed her, becaule she more quickly forefaw the consequences. Terrified at the scene that was taking place be-

weer

Lord,

on I

eautif eighe

h has le fub

nfole

y be ( your g

ll be i

anor;

n Lesc

struck

e to en

apartn

ween her brother and Don Lescar, she endeaconwas ained q.0al in-

she was

place between

oured in vain to footh them: " Be calm, my ord," faid she: "Brother, do not vex him." "It is for your fake alone, Eleanor," faid might on Lescar, "that I can forget the infults and rogance of a youth, who is unworthy a fifter fo was, eautiful and interesting: my heart is already nented eighed down with care; the hand of an affafthe fo- has bereft me of a faithful friend and a valu-Am-le subject: it is you only who have power to of cha-nfole me: I love you, Eleanor, you shall one ge: he y be Queen of St. Verrado-Do you not unasion he stand me? You are at present young; I will st senti- your guardian and protector, but at last you a man, all be my Queen."- ny of his It is impossible to express the astonishment of beneath anor; the idea of ever becoming the wife of sed equal n Lescar, however distant the period might fruck her with a horror which she could not because ceal: he observed it, but not thinking it a equences, e to enter further upon the subject, he left apartment; but with a look which taught his will was refifted.

us!" staid Eleanor, "what will become of

"Fear nothing, fifter," faid Ambrofe, "Go will protect us; I trembled on the waves, I wen at our separation from our dear father and Peter but I will never weep or tremble at the threats a tyrant: we will endeavour to fee our good of man; he will confole and advise us." Sayin this, they took their way towards the port, int hope of meeting the Count d'Oresty, but the were that night disappointed: in short, sever days elapsed before they faw him, except in presence of witnesses, before whom it was i possible to discourse of any thing interesting During this time, Ambrose and Eleanor had mortification of hearing the most horrid exec tions bestowed upon the name of Carlton; was now univerfally believed to be the affaffin the naval Chief, and the arrival of the Verral veffel was awaited with impatience, to facil

both gean

there

to the

while habita being

retrea

whole

a short

former

Elea as the under t

Ambro

confider

ciples, a attachment

if his

come

" Go

, I wep

d Peter

hreats

good of

Sayin

rt, int

but the

t, fever

ept int

t was i

nterestin

or had rid exec

arlton;

affaffin

e Verrad

to facril

both him and his accomplice, Peter, to the vengeance of the people. Eleanor and her brother, therefore, far from looking with joy, as formerly, to the moment of his arrival, prayed fervently to Heaven that it might be retarded. In the mean while, a delay so unusual began to alarm the inhabitants, from the supposition of their vessel being captured, and a discovery made of their retreat. The port was doubly guarded, and the whole colony put into a state of defence; but in a short time their fears insensibly decreased, and lulled in indolent security, they returned to their former course of luxury and dissipation.

Eleanor and Ambrose continued to be treated as the distinguished guests of the Governor; but under this mask of kindness, it was easy to discern that he concealed an implacable hatred to Ambrose; he could not, without indignation, behold the pride and firmness of a youth whom he considered as a savage; the strictness of his principles, and the solidity of his arguments, always on the side of virtue, incensed him; the unshaken

attachment

attachment too which he at all times discovered to his dear friend, and the freedom with which. even at the peril of his life, he expressed his sentiments on this subject, was another cause of his difgust; in short, his hatred arose to such a pitch, that had it not been for Eleanor, it is probable he would have facrificed him to his refentment. She, however, more foft and gentle, mediated between her brother and Don Lescar, and thus warded of the blow that might otherwise have proved fatal. As observed before, Eleanor was now nearly fifteen; she was tall, and well-made; her furburnt complexion was fresh as the dew; her teeth were white and regular, and her large dark eyes fparkled with intelligence and vivacity: her hair flowed negligently in natural curls upon her shoulders, and there was a gentleness in her manners, and a grace in her least motion, that rendered her whole figure inexpressibly interesting Don Lescar was struck with her innocence and beauty, and from the first moment of her arrival conceived the idea of making her one day his wife, price

From flow migh hofp both, groun grati Ar feen : d'Ore ed in voure tue; I ed inh luxur their mined caying matur paffion which From this cause had arisen the favours he had beflowed on her and Ambrose; favours which they might justly have claimed from humanity and hospitality; but Don Lescar was a stranger to both, and was too depraved to bestow upon other grounds than those of self-convenience or selfgratification.

Ambrofe and Eleanor had now more than once feen and communicated their griefs to the Count d'Oresty; the good old man sincerely sympathized in their forrows, and by his counfels endeavoured to confirm them in the principles of virtue; he often pointed out to them, in the wretchark eyes ed inhabitants of St. Verrado, the fatal effects of uxury and intemperance; "Behold," faid he, heir features distorted, their constitutions undermined, their reason obscured, their faculties decaying even before they have attained their due teresting maturity, and their whole frame convulsed with passions which degrade them far beneath the beasts er arrival which they despise; such, my children, is the his wife, price of pleasures which cloy in the possession,

From

covered

which,

nis fen-

e of his

a pitch,

able he

t. She,

etween

rded of

d fatal.

arly fif.

er fun-

ner teeth

her hair

pon her

er man-

hat ren-

nce and

and

and which are purfued more, perhaps, from habit than from inclination. He then set before them the superior advantages of a life of virtue and moderation, and thus strengthened them against the temptations to which their innocence was exposed among the distipated companions with which they were daily constrained to associate. One day as they were, as usual, discourfing upon their misfortunes, and lamenting the cruel necessity which doomed them to live undera tyrant whom they abhorred, having remained a few minutes filent, the Count addressed them in these words: "When I reflect, my children, upon the dangers to which your innocence is exposed, and that your lives are scarcely fafe in a place where you are beheld as the friend of one who is univerfally believed to be the affaffin of a man, who, though stained with the blackest crimes, was nevertheless the idol of his comrades, I feel an irrefistible defire to deliver you from so many perils: my own life is of little importance; in a few years I shall be removed to a country far be-

folved

abode

thewe

unfou

" ]

must :

or sta

of ou

Verra

" you

rests n

which

your f

tant o

yond

yond this circumscribed spot of earth. I had resolved to wait for this happy release in St. Verrado, since a whimsical destiny had made it my abode; but your misfortunes, my children, the perils to which your innocence is exposed, has shewed me the possibility of an escape, which would otherwise have remained undiscovered, as unfought."

"But," faid Eleanor, "our dear Carlton; we must stay and take him with us."

"Yes," faid Ambrose, "we must take him, or stay and die with him: while a hope remains of our dear father's arrival, we cannot leave St. Verrado."

"My dear children," faid the Count d'Oresty, "your affection and gratitude charms, and interests me still more in your behalf; but rest assured, whatever may be the cause, that the vessel which you have reason to suppose deprived you of your friends will never more return to St. Verrado. Don Lescar himself, nay, every inhabitant of this island, has relinquished all idea of it;

far be-

ha-

efore

irtue

them

ence

nions

affo-

cour-

g the

ndera

a few

n these

on the

d, and

where

iniver-

, who,

was ne-

l an ir-

any pe-

; in 2

who knows, therefore, Heaven may have preserved your friends; and that misfortune (if, as is generally believed the vessel has been captured) which may end in the destruction of the colony, may have brought life and liberty to them: but however this may be, you are as likely, if God permit, to meet them in other countries as in this."

Eleanor and Ambrose acknowledged the force of this argument, and were soon persuaded to enter into a measure, which the Count assured them afforded a much greater probability of discovering their friends than remaining at St. Verrado. They expressed their readiness to be guided by his advice, and enquired how he proposed to effect their escape?

The Count d'Oresty did not think proper a this time to disclose his plans; he only counselle Ambrose to moderate his impetuosity, and kee up a friendly intercourse with Don Lescar; of which he told them the success of their enterprize would in a great measure depend; he then depart ed, t

more Ele

Aructi

the Co

"We

more o

"A ourfelv

meafur

place.

of the g

"W

ty, "C

counter

eferv-

is ge-

ured)

olony,

: but

F God

as in force

ded to affured

disco

. Ver-

e guid

ropoled

oper a

unfelle

nd kee

car; o

nterpriz

depart

ed, telling them to attend every day at the port, and that when he had digested his plan, and arranged matters for its execution, he would talk more to them upon the subject.

Eleanor and Ambrose exactly sollowed the infructions of their friend: they attended regularly at the port, but a week elapsed before they saw the Count d'Oresty; at length he accosted them: "Well, my children," said he, "do you think you shall have courage to trust yourselves once more on the seas in your little bark?"

"Ah, father," faid Ambrose, "we commit ourselves wholly to your guidance; we have lost our dear Carlton, and think ourselves beyond measure happy in meeting a friend to supply his place. We are very simple—we know nothing of the great world—It is you who must advise and direct us."

"Well, my children," faid the Count d'Orefty, "God, who sees the purity of my intentions toward you, will, I hope, direct me: we must ensounter perils—"

Talk not of perils;" interrupted Ambrole; tell us only what we must do-deliver us from Don Lescar-from this wicked place, fince we must no longer indulge the hope of seeing our dear father."

"It is in your little bark, my children," faid the Count, "that we must attempt our escape; I have examined it, and find it folid and well built; if we can once embark, I doubt not but I shall be able to steer so, as to land you on some shore inhabited by beings less cruel than those amongst whom you now reside: from thence, if God spare me so long, I will convey you to England, where you may, perhaps, hear tidings of your friend; but much before remains to be done; your little bark, you fee, is chained in the basin; the keys of the port must therefore be ob tained or we cannot proceed in the enterprize "He do you think, Ambrose, that you would have cou "you, rage to enter the apartment of Don Lescar, an Lescar get possession of them?"

"I could have courage," faid Ambrose, " do an whon

. ...

" from fleeps

he aw

" B

d'Orei

. " (

will be the far necessa from t to with ber of yourse

"Bu

ble opp

wine.

do any thing rather than live under a tyrant whom I despise and abhor but how ""

"You must take them," said the Count, "from under the head of Don Lescar while he fleeps."

"Oh Heaven!" exclaimed Eleanor, " should he awake! my brother's life____'

"Be not alarmed, Eleanor," faid the Count d'Oresty, " follow exactly my directions, and all will be well. If the wind, Ambrose, continue in the same quarter as at present, (for this will be necessary to observe, that it may blow us swiftly from the coast) towards evening feign an excuse to withdraw, and steal privately into the chamber of Don Lescar, where you must conceal to be d in the yourself till he retires to rest."

"But," faid Ambrose-"

erprize "Hear me to an end," interrupted the Count; ave cou "you, Eleanor, take this powder, and when Don car, an Lescar has drunk a few glasses, watch a favourable opportunity, and drop a pinch of it into his ofe, " wine. It will first cause a drowfiness, which will

e be ob

fe:

om

we 7110

faid

ape;

well

ot but

fome

those ice, if

o Eng-

ings of

will probably induce him to repair to his chamber, and throw him into a deep sleep, during which, Ambrose may, without danger of awaking him, take possession of the keys, which, when he retires to rest, are always placed beneath his pillow. Now, my children, if you have address and courage to execute this, you must immediately haste with the keys to this place, where I shall expect you, and be ready to perform what is farther necessary to the success of the enterprize."

The attempt was bold and hazardous; the execution of it, if not impossible, seemed difficult, and replete with dangers; but Ambrose, transported with the hope of escaping from a country which he had in horror, and also with the thought of visiting England, where a probability remained of one day seeing his dearest friend, if he was still an inhabitant of the earth, promised every thing. Eleanor, though alarmed for the safety of her brother, consented to perform her part, and after some farther arrangements concerning the e

E tions tion, car, into ] the h roufir Heav flight fome ( Elean with a by the car foc tired to possible momen in the c

which !

been ac

the execution of the plan, they returned to the palace of the Governor.

Early in the evening, pursuant to the instructions of his friend, Ambrose, alledging indisposition, withdrew from the presence of Don Lescar, and watching an opportunity, flipt privately into his chamber, and concealed himfelf behind the hangings. He left Don Lescar as usual caroufing with a number of his comrades, but as if Heaven favoured the enterprise, on account of a flight indisposition which had afflicted him for some days, he dismissed them at an early hour. Eleanor watched a favourable opportunity, and, with a beating heart, dropt the powder given her by the Count d'Oresty into his glass. Don Lefcar foon was fensible of its power, and rising, retired to his chamber. Let the Reader judge if possible what were the feelings of Eleanor at this moment; the idea of her brother being concealed in the chamber of Don Lescar, of the dangers to which he was exposed, of the double part she had been acting, which obliged her to fmile with pretended

ing ak-

m-hen his

fhall

far-

e ex-

e."

trans-

ountry

mainne was

every

fafety r part,

erning

the

all rushed forcibly on her mind; she threw hersels into a chair, and bursting into an agony of tears, "Oh!" said she, "what is to be compared with sincerity and truth! What advantages can be equivalent to the loss of it! Better were it to have borne all, the malice Don Lescar could have inslicted, than have entered into this labyrinth of deception; gracious Heaven! should Don Lescar awake—should my brother be discovered—what will be the consequence—I tremble—merciful God protect him—save him—if we have done wrong, forgive us—Oh save him, save him, let not Eleanor lament her last, her only friend."

In the mean while Don Lescar entered his chamber, and was scarcely stretched upon his bed, before, as the Count d'Oresty had foretold, he sunk into a deep sleep, and gave Ambrose, who boldly advanced to the bed, an opportunity of seizing the keys, which, at this moment, seemed to him a greater treasure than the wealth of the Indies. He then, as it had been agreed, stole to the expire chamber had door, immedianxious ing. out statement of guards ers wifrights he had to the constraint of the little arfenal

der.

lt was

to

th of have iend."

to the apartment of his fifter, who was ready to expire with joy upon seeing him safe out of the chamber of Don Lescar. Little passed; he took her hand, and they escaped together by a private door, of which Eleanor had the key: they flew immediately to the port where the Count d'Oresty anxiously expected the success of the undertaking. He no fooner beheld the keys, than without staying to accost them or to disclose his intentions, "Run, run, my friends," cried he to the guards, "the prison is on fire, and all the prisoners will escape." While he was speaking, a frightful volume of smoke arose to the clouds: he had found means to fet fire to a neighbouring assenal in which the pirates kept all their powder. The guards alarmed, quit their posts, run to the conflagration, and afford the Count an opportunity of opening the palisades. Accompanied by his young friends, he precipitately enters he little bark, unchains it, and rows from land, t was not long before the Verradian arfenal lew up, and made the Count easy respecting the pursuit, to ng, felf ars,

with 1 be

have e in-

Lef-

red--mer-

him,

ed his

is bed, old, he

, who nity of feemed

of the d, stole pursuit, which he was sensible would be made as. ter them, should his absence or that of his young friends be discovered; but the universal alarm and confusion occasioned by the unexpected event, precluded all idea of an immediate pursuit.

A brisk gale blowing from land, our navigators lost no time in spreading the sail of their little vessel. Eleanor, her eyes fixed upon the island, motionless with terror and astonishment, could not utter a single word: the Count d'Oresty and Ambrose, mute also, busied themselves with stowing some provisions which the Count, a short time before he set fire to the arsenal, had sound means to conceal in a retired spot at the foot of the palisades, and with the assistance of Ambrose, had conveyed, after the retreat of the guards, into the vessel. Ambrose first broke silence, "Whither are we going, father?" said he.

"Can I tell, my fon?" faid the Count, still confused with the events that had occurred in such quick succession to each other. "Let us get c

from

the C

fomel

"

"No,

Cuba.

The

cc N

time to was da seen, b lighten number coasted but the more vi

get clear of this hated land, before we talk of our rout."

- "Our island," said Eleanor, "cannot be far from hence."
- "And what do you infer from that?" faid
- "I do not know," replied Eleanor, "but fomehow I have an idea that we should find our dear Carlton there."
- "Mere chimera, my child," faid the Count;
  "No, we must not quit an inhabited for a desert land; we will direct our bark towards Cuba."

The bark rapidly cut the waves, and in a short time they lost sight of St. Verrado; the night was dark, and neither moon nor stars was to be seen, but in a few hours the sun began to enlighten the east, and the Count perceived a number of small islands, which he had apparently coasted during the night without knowing it; but the waves seeming to drive the bark with more violence, he was fearful of being driven into

afung

ent,

and

r lit-

could

flow-

flort found

oot of

s, into

Whi-

nt, still arred in Let us get into the Canal of Bahama (not doubting but that he was near it) the rapidity of which is fo great, that it threatens instant destruction. In consequence of this, by dint of oars and fails, they worked the veffel, and the next morning found themselves near a coast, which, from the form of the buildings, and the colours of the veffels that were in the port, the Count judged to belong to the English. How great was the joy of our voyagers! The vessel made into the port, and they landed amidst a crowd of inhabitants, who put to them a thousand questions, which the fingularity of their dress, and the peculiar form of their vesfel, naturally excited: they foon, in their turn learnt that they were in the Island of Providence, one of the Lucay Isles, situated upon the Canal of Bahama, that it belonged to the English, that Sir James Corpley was the Governor, and that they might expect from his humanity all the fuccour they could defire. This was joyful information; the islanders readily conducted them into the presence of the Governor; but what was the astonishment, when their ton!

At

child

natel

" do

God Coui

holdi

paffinand

half Amb

of th

at fe

when, upon entering the apartment, they beheld their lost, their lamented friend, Colonel Carloton! In an instant they were in his arms. "My children—my father—my protector," was alternately repeated.

At length, becoming more calm, "To what unforeseen event, my children," said the Colonel, "do we owe this unexpected, this unhoped-for happiness?"

"Oh, my dear father," faid Ambrose, "if God had not sent us this good friend (pointing to Count d'Oresty) who has risked his life for our sakes, we should never have been blessed with beholding you; he has—"

At this moment, Peter, informed of what was passing, rushed precipitately into the apartment, and overcome by the excess of his joy, sunk, half fainting, at the feet of his young friends. Ambrose and Eleanor were rejoiced at the sight of the good old man, and were not a little affected at seeing tears (though of joy) roll down his fur-

rowed

that reat, onfethey

that ng to voythey

m of

larity ir vefturn dence,

out to

Canal

n, that

d that

ormam into

vas the

rowed cheeks. They supported him in their arms, and endeavoured to calm his agitated spirits by a thousand tender expressions, which the gratitude and affection of their hearts dictated.

Sir James Corpley, the Governor, feemed fincerly to participate in their happiness, and invited the Count d'Oresty and his young friends to remain his guests during their residence in the island. The Colonel expressed his acknowledgments to the Count d'Oresty (whom he recollected formerly to have feen in England) for the attention he had shewn to his young pupils, and they all fat down to an elegant repast, during which they had leifure to converfe, and recover from their fatigues. What a happiness to be thus re-united after the dangers they had encountered! They could not eat, they looked at each other, questioned, and made such a confusion of their adventures, that the Governor requested they would recount them in the order they had occurred, affuring them that he was already much interested in their fate, and wished only to know in wh reque the C ftance during but as partici the m him to friend nel, cc was em little b veffel!" "A

" I in ea, and cannot ght of a to fink in what he could be serviceable to them. The request was no sooner made than complied with; the Colonel began first, and related the circumstance of his shipwreck, and all that had happened during his residence in the uninhabited island; but as the Reader is already acquainted with these particulars, we will take up his narration only at the moment in which Ambrose and Eleanor lest him to visit, for the last time, the tomb of their friend Derley. "The children," said the Colonel, "had scarcely lest me, when Peter, who was employed in stowing the provisions in our little bark, suddenly cried out, a vessel, Sir! a vessel!"

"A veffel, I replied, do you fay?"

"Yes, Sir," faid he, " it approaches, it makes apidly for land."

"I immediately turned my eyes toward the a, and faw a ship making towards us full sail. cannot exactly describe my sensations at the sht of an object so unexpected: My heart seemto sink at the moment I was transported with joy;

know

ir

its

ra-

in-

in-

s to

the

dg-

ect-

at-

and

ring

over

o be

oun-

each

on of rested

y had much

ion and, as if I forefaw the confequences, this event, to long and ardently wished for, disquieted, and even alarmed me. Friends or enemies. faid I to Peter, let us meet them. Accordingly I walked to that part of the shore to which I saw the veffel making. In proportion as it approached my fears diminished, and the Spanish colours, which were hoisted, entirely removed them: I thought we might expect every necessary fuccour from a civilized nation of Europe; probably, in alliance with ours. The Spaniards foon came upon deck, and shortly after descended from the vessel, headed by their captain. " Is this island inhabited," faid the Chief, in a furly tone of voice?

"No," I replied, "this is the first vessel we have feen touch here.""

"And who are you?" faid he, "what-"

"He was continuing, when one of his own peo me, we ple, animated by a motive to which I was then we calle stranger, fired a pistol, which grazed his shoulder pirates, "Ah, traitor," faid the Chief, drawing another, "defliny; it th upor his h tol (1 though Inatc felled ately confp

He claimi

" V lonel.

"0 ther, 1

" T his nar myself

it thus? - Die villain!"-Saying which, he fired upon the affaffin, who escaped by turning afide his head, and was preparing to draw another piftol (for they had each two at their girdle) when I, thoughtless of the consequences, imprudently fnatched an iron crow from one of the men, and felled the affaffin to the ground; I was immediately seized, while a ball from another of the conspirators dispatched the unfortunate Chief."

Here Ambrose interrupted the Colonel, by exclaiming, "I was fure he did not kill him-"

- "What do you fay, my child?" faid the Colonel.
- "Oh, nothing," said Ambrose: "go on, father, we will explain this afterward."

"The confusion," faid the Colonel, refuming his narrative, "immediately became general; myself and Peter, who had attempted to defend own peo me, were conveyed on board the vessel: in vain as then we called on you, my children, and entreated the shoulder pirates, at least, to join yours to our unfortunate other," destiny; folely occupied with the desperate act

his

iet-

nies,

ngly

faw

ach-

ours,

m:I

ccour

ly, in

came

m the

ifland

tone of

effel we

they had just committed, they embarked precipitately, without paying any regard to our prayers, inhumanly put us in irons, and confined us with a dozen unfortunate women, prisoners like ourfelves. I need not describe the horror of our fituation, separated from you, my children, and and flaves without knowing our masters. Toward the middle of the night, some coarse food was thrown into our dungeon, and in the morning fix failors, handcuffed, were added to our miserable fociety: from these we learnt the motives that had given rife to the horrid fcene transacted on the island, and also the cause of their own detention. The prisoners confined with us belonged, No, fai a few days before, to a French merchantman, conspira which had been attacked and taken by the pirates. George Blake, the late Commander, being with: th diffatisfied with the little courage shewn by his orm a co comrades in the action, reproached them feverely, count and formally fignified to them that they should are w not have any share of the booty: this highly in- us, sai censed them, and one of the number, named ten held

Burn affaffi portu or Cu there The p ftruck either scende unfortu prisone us this tuffed a

Burney,

ers, vith ourour and ward Was g fix rable ed on ntman,

pi-

Burney, formed a conspiracy with the others to affaffinate their Chief on the first favourable opportunity that should offer, to go to St. Domingo or Cuba, fell their booty, and return to England, there to live quietly on their ill-gotten wealth. The plot was ripe for execution, when Blake, fruck with the unexpected fight of our island, either from curiofity or the hope of booty, dekended upon it. The rest explained itself, the unfortunate Chief was affaffinated, and we made that prisoners: But, faid I to the failor who gave is this information, how is it that you are handdeten- suffed and confined? Are you not their friends? onged, No, faid the failor, we refused to join in the onspiracy against our Chief, who was a genethe pi- ous, brave man, undeserving the fate he met , being with: they are afraid lest we, in our turn, should by his orm a conspiracy against them, and it is on this everely, count they confine us. And to what port, faid y should are we now going? It is of little importance ighly in- us, faid the failor, for a council has this day , named een held, in which it was probably agreed to Burney, massacre 12

maffacre us all. Barbarians! we exclaimed with one accord. It is their custom, said the sailor, the French merchant ship which they took yesterday was sunk with all the men it contained, after they had pillaged the cargo, and taken out these unhappy women, whom they will now probably sacrifice, as they do not return to the colony to which their vessel was bound.

"The women, upon this horrid recital, broke into violent lamentations: as for me, I patiently waited for death, which no longer appeared unwelcome, after I had lost all that could rende life desirable.

the middle of the next day, when it was on a funden violently agitated, and we judged from the noise of cannon which affailed us on every side that the pirates were engaged with another vesse which, by the size of the balls that struck to some of our companions judged to be of superiforce. I need not describe our anxiety during the engagement, which lasted about two hour

ho

You off,

whi

atte Cap

then

and

part

that

from

poffer

Ifle o

had 1

death

freedo

cated r

rival a

Sir Jan

had bee

ception

with ailor, yefained, n out w prohe co-broke atiently ared untoward on a full from th very fid

struck u of superi

wo hou

hope and fear alternately possessed us; at length our trap opened, and a strange voice exclaimed, You are free! immediately our irons were taken off, and we were put on board another vessel, which proved to be English. The pirates had attempted to give charge to the English, but the Captain had made use of his superiority to attack them; they had fought, it was faid, desperately, and did not strike to the English till the greater part of their men were killed. We learnt farther that the Captain was charged with dispatches from the English Government to its American possessions, and that he would first touch at the Isle of Providence, to the Governor of which he had letters of recall. Thus from flavery and death were we unexpectedly restored to life and freedom: I made myself known, and communicated my flory to the Captain, who, upon our arrival at the Isle of Providence, presented me to Sir James Corpley, the Governor, with whom I had been formerly intimate in England: his reception was such as might have been expected

maffacre us all. Barbarians! we exclaimed with one accord. It is their custom, said the sailor, the French merchant ship which they took yesterday was sunk with all the men it contained, after they had pillaged the cargo, and taken out these unhappy women, whom they will now probably sacrifice, as they do not return to the colony to which their vessel was bound.

"The women, upon this horrid recital, broke into violent lamentations: as for me, I patiently waited for death, which no longer appeared unwelcome, after I had lost all that could rende life desirable.

the middle of the next day, when it was on a funder violently agitated, and we judged from the noise of cannon which affailed us on every side that the pirates were engaged with another vesse which, by the size of the balls that struck us fome of our companions judged to be of superiforce. I need not describe our anxiety during the engagement, which lasted about two hour

our

You off,

whi

Cap

then

and

that

from

poffe:

Ifle c

death

freedo

cated

rival

Sir Ja

had be

ho

from

ailor, k yefained, en out

he co-

with

, broke catiently ared untoward on a fud from th very fid her vesse

struck u of superi

wo hour

ho

hope and fear alternately possessed us; at length our trap opened, and a strange voice exclaimed, You are free! immediately our irons were taken off, and we were put on board another vessel, which proved to be English. The pirates had attempted to give char to the English, but the Captain had made use of his superiority to attack them; they had fought, it was faid, desperately, and did not strike to the English till the greater part of their men were killed. We learnt farther that the Captain was charged with dispatches from the English Government to its American possessions, and that he would first touch at the Isle of Providence, to the Governor of which he had letters of recall. Thus from flavery and death were we unexpectedly reftored to life and freedom: I made myself known, and communicated my flory to the Captain, who, upon our arrival at the Isle of Providence, presented me to Sir James Corpley, the Governor, with whom I had been formerly intimate in England: his reception was such as might have been expected from the most generous of men; he was interested in my misfortunes, and fince that time has detained me his distinguished guest: but an important expedition is now in agitation; fix of the Verradian prisoners, intimidated by the threats, and allured by the promises of the Governor, have confessed the situation of the island they inhabit, and in a few days, four hundred men, of which Sir James has given me the command, will embark, to extirpate this horde of robbers, and take poffession of the island in the name of the English Monarch: But do not think, my children, said the Colonel to Ambrose and Eleanor, that I was unmindful of your fituation; I had permission from my friend to touch at our island, little fuspecting that you had yentured to abandon it."X

The Colonel thus terminated his recital, and received the thanks of all present. Ambrose then recounted all that had happened fince his feparation from the Colonel; and his recital was continued by the Count d'Oresty, whose courage and exertions

exe uni ed |

froi whi

gen

mof uion

his juiti

T

have by th friend rado : ted to and tl had b

length The

made that hi

exertions in behalf of the amiable orphans were univerfally applauded. The Colonel again thanked him in the warmest terms, and a friendship from that moment took place between them, which continued to the end of their lives. generous Governor congratulated his guests in the most polite and friendly terms upon their reuion, appointed by Providence to take place in his island, which on this occasion, he observed, juitified its name.

The happiness of Eleanor and Ambrose would have been complete, had it not been embittered by the thought of a second separation from their friend, on account of the expedition to St. Verrado; Ambrose earnestly entreated to be permitted to accompany him, but the tears of his fifter, and the commands of the Colonel, to which he had been accustomed implicitly to submit, at length prevailed, and he relinquished his request. The Count d'Oresty, notwithstanding his age, made one in the expedition, justly considering that his knowledge of the island might forward

the

ofe then feparas conti-

inte-

e has

n im-

of the

reats,

ernor,

ey in-

en, of

d, will

s, and

of the

y chil-

leanor,

I had

ifland,

bandon

al, and

age and

xertions

from the most generous of men; he was interested in my misfortunes, and since that time has detained me his distinguished guest: but an important expedition is now in agitation; fix of the Verradian prisoners, intimidated by the threats, and allured by the promifes of the Governor, have confessed the situation of the island they inhabit, and in a few days, four hundred men, of which Sir James has given me the command, will embark, to extirpate this horde of robbers, and take poffession of the island in the name of the English Monarch: But do not think, my children, faid the Colonel to Ambrose and Eleanor, that I was unmindful of your fituation; I had permission from my friend to touch at our island, little fuspecting that you had ventured to abandon it."X

The Colonel thus terminated his recital, and received the thanks of all present. Ambrose then recounted all that had happened since his separation from the Colonel; and his recital was continued by the Count d'Oresty, whose courage and exertions

univ

from

geno

uion his

juiti

have by th

frien

rado ted to and t

lengt

had

The

that l

the

exertions in behalf of the amiable orphans were univerfally applianded. The Colonel again thanked him in the warmest terms, and a friendship from that moment took place between them, which continued to the end of their lives. The generous Governor congratulated his guests in the most polite and friendly terms upon their reuion, appointed by Providence to take place in his island, which on this occasion, he observed, justified its name.

The happiness of Eleanor and Ambrose would have been complete, had it not been embittered by the thought of a second separation from their friend, on account of the expedition to St. Verrado; Ambrose earnestly entreated to be permitted to accompany him, but the tears of his sister, and the commands of the Colonel, to which he had been accustomed implicitly to submit, at length prevailed, and he relinquished his request. The Count d'Oresty, notwithstanding his age, made one in the expedition, justly considering that his knowledge of the island might forward

se then

inte-

ne has

n im-

of the

reats,

ernor,

ney in-

en, of

d, will

s, and

of the

y chil-

leanor,

I had

ifland,

bandon

al, and

ge and

ertions

Ambrose accompanied their friends to the port, and with their eyes followed the little fleet, (confisting of three ships) till they could no long distinguish it: they then returned with heavy hearts to the Governor, who used all his arguments to mitigate their fears for the safety of their friends, and to inspire them with the hope of their safe and speedy return.

It feemed as if Heaven favoured the expedition against St. Verrado; the weather continued favourable, and at the end of three days, toward midnight, the little fleet arrived before the island; the whole colony was buried in sleep, except the guards, who watched before the palifades, to prevent any one mounting the bank, and entering the vessels.

The fix Verradians (who, by the promise of liberty and a high reward, had been prevailed upon to enter into the plot) were dispatched in the long boat, and having entered the port, made themselves known to the sentinels, whom they amused Cold of the cut is the a guar the a

with

perfectively foon

awal

tack,

Lesca

foon b

the V with e

Indies,

hiw This plant is peculiar to the Anice with a falle recital of their adventures, while the Colonel and his men, favoured by the darkness of the night, scaled the palisades, fell upon, and cut them to pieces before they had time to found the alarm or to defend themselves. One of the guards, however, escaping, ran to the city, rang the alarm, and roused the inhabitants, who scarcely awake, knew not what they meant, nor what enemies they had to encounter. The English disperfed in the streets, attacked the Verradians, as they came out of their houses, and lighted brands soon set fire to the four corners of the city. Don Lescar astonished, thunderstruck at this sudden attack, at length affembled about two hundred men, and advanced in order for battle: the flaughter foon became horrible; on one fide, the English, armed with fwords and bayonets, on the other, the Verradians vigorously defending themselves with enormous masses of bamboo*, presented a atched antibe loss

I

not

ort,

difearts

ends,

fafe

การกร peditinued oward

e the sleep,

ne pali-

fe of li-

the long

amused

with

*The bamboo here spoken of is not that of the Eastladies, which we frequently see converted into walking anes. This plant is peculiar to the American Isles (though

fcene of the utmost horror and confusion. In the mean time, the besieged, little formed for combat, enervated by luxury and pleasure, first gave ground; and to render their defeat complete, a hundred men, which were left for that purpose in the ships, bombarded the city, and razed the citadel, the construction of which was not very folid.

In this expedition the English lost twenty men, and the Verradians nearly three hundred men and women; for the women, laying aside the timidity of their sex, armed with bamboos and stakes, rushed into the midst of the battle, and fell sighting beside their husbands. In the midst of the carnage sell the proud Don Lescar, by the hand of the Count d'Oresty: the rest of the inhabitants having demanded quarter, the English Chiefs caused the slaughter to cease, and stopped the pro-not very common) and rifes to the height of thirty or forty feet, with a fize proportionate; its trunk is furnished, at equal distances, with knots, containing twelve or fisteen pints of liquor; its leaf very much resembles the elder.

gress

g

t

fi

W

tic

to

wi

the

Ve

fet

tho

the

ed b

der:

the

com

they

city,

unex

tify

mean

he ha

he

gave ete, 2 ofe in he ci-

the

men, en and midity stakes, l fight-of the ne hand abitants

Chiefs the pro-

rnished, at or fifteen

gress of the fire. Day, at length returned to discover the difasters of the night, and the Colonel satisfied with his expedition, thought of re-imbarking with his prisoners: but what was his consternation! not a fingle veffel, not a fingle boat was to be feen in the basin. The men who were left with the little fleet, had difperfed themfelves over the city to affift their people, and the treacherous Verradians had feized this unguarded moment to fet fire to the ships, as well to their own as to those of the English. Both Colonel Carlton and the Count d'Oresty had heard the explosion caused by the blowing up of the magazines of powder; they had distinguished the Heavens red with the reflection of the flames; but in the heat of combat, in the confusion that universally reigned, they had attributed all to the conflagration of the city, which made a rapid progress. An event so unexpected, did not a little embarrafs and mortify the Colonel; he saw himself deprived of means to return to the Isle of Providence, where he had left his beloved pupils, and from whence

gress

he hoped fliortly to embark for England. Befides this, he was wholly destitute of shelter, or any thing necessary to feed and lodge nearly four hundred of his own men and upwards of three hundred prisoners. He was constrained, however, to accommodate himfelf to these difficulties, and as the only part there remained for him to take, ordered the houses that were saved from the flames to be fearched for fail-cloth, cables, and tools necessary to construct a vessel. These were happily found, and the carpenters immediately fet to work. They laboured without intermission day and night, and at the end of fix weeks launched two little barks, unworthy the name of ships, sufficient to contain the Colonel and about two hundred of his men, with whom he refolved to embark, leaving the refidue to guard the Verradian prisoners. He took with him also twenty-five unfortunate women, who had long groaned in the prisons of St. Verrado. But before we take leave of St. Verrado, we must acquaint the Reader with an interesting fer vag him ma buil Curafee fma tent

noti

cels

little

" be

"

" tic

" the

"Iı

" in

event,

des any our hree owiculhim from bles. These mediinterof fix ny the olonel whom idue to k with n, who errado.

ado, we

teresting

event,

nuance in the island. One day having visited different parts of the city that had escaped the ravages of the slames, a Verradian, who was with him, pointed to the house of their old Commander, George Blake, as the largest and best built in all the colony, excepting the Governor's.
Curiosity induced the Colonel to enter it; he ascended into an upper chamber, and observing a small cabinet, forced it open to examine the contents. These were a few jewels, and several parcels of letters and papers, which he perused with little attention, till the following attracted his notice.

"Why, my dear Eleanor, must I deceive the best of fathers! Why is he blinded by ambition? Are not virtues, titles of nobility, and the qualities of the heart, inestimable treafures? Oh, my wife, my children, why must I not own you? Why must you not find shelter in the arms of my venerable, my much-re-, fpected

"thing ready for your departure; I confide you "to safe hands; Derley accompanies you, and my heart is easy: kiss my Eleanor and Ambrose a "thousand times for me: how young they are to encounter the fatigues of so long a voyage! but "Heaven and the tender cares of a mother will protect them. I shall find you all at Charles-"Town. Adieu, embark without uneasiness, afford that nothing but death shall prevent an affectionate husband from soon joining you."

The Colonel did not, the Reader will conclude, unmoved peruse a letter, which, upon a comparison, evidently appeared to be written by the same hand as that found upon Derley; the date was nearly the same, but it had no signature. He now searched every part of the cabinet with the minutest attention, and at last drew from a private drawer a picture of the most interesting nature: it represented a beautiful young woman holding two children; "It is Eleanor! It is Ambrose!"

Ar fea ed nif was bro car WI the pari the ligh the idea thef pira were had pare ideas

prefe

matt

you I my ofe a re to ! but will arles-conpon a en by; the ature.

u."

resting roman It is om a

rose!"

Ambrose!" The Colonel called to mind their features at the time he first entered the unnihabited island, and traced the refemblance undiminished by the years that had then elapsed. Eleanor was the exact refemblance of her mother; Ambrose, more masculine, was building a house of cards, upon which was written, "telle eft la vie." What an interesting discovery! The features of the woman (though fresh and lively) upon a comparison, evidently resembled those delineated in the gold box of Derley; but still it threw no light upon the birth of his pupils. As he viewed the interesting miniature, a thousand different ideas rushed upon his mind: By what means did these precious deposits fall into the hands of the pirate? Could it be possible his amiable pupils were the offspring of a wretch fo depraved; or had he plundered and destroyed their unfortunate parents? His mind floated between these two ideas, when a letter, written in a woman's hand, presented itself, and threw some light upon the matter: it was as follows.

At length, barbarian, dobreak the bonds in " which you have for fix months held me, and " return to my country; but, alas! I return del " folate and wretched, deprived by thy merciles "hand of all that could render life deffrable." "Detested wretch! where are my poor children? "my Eleanor, my Ambrose? In what corner of "the earth hast thou concealed them? Derley, "the friend, the confidant of my husband, the "only support of an unfortunate woman, is " no more ...... Ah, without doubt, my chil-"dren sleep with him in the night of the "tomb. Oh, insupportable reflection! I can no " more; the moment is favourable, and I de-"part: but tremble, villain, the vengeance of a " just God will pursue thee, and deliver the earth "from a monster who contaminates it."

This letter evidently had a correspondence with the former; the names and date were the same, and upon a calculation, the Colonel found the time nearly approached the period in which his pupils done fecured the letters and pidiore, pur dou thei who ter : veri Ver fron was Geo veffe outla Lesc efcap them darin being Color the with

barke

days

lin and deiles ble. ren? er of rley, the n, is chilf the an no I dee of a e earth fame, and the pupils

pupils were left upon the ifland: he no longer doubted, though ignorant by what means, but their misfortunes originated from this villain, to whom it appeared, by the superscription, the letter was addressed. Hoping to make farther discoveries, he enquired very particularly among the Verradians concerning their naval Chief, hoping from thence to draw fome conclusions, but he was disappointed; all he could learn was, that George Blake was the Captain of an English veffel, who upon fome misdemeanor had been outlawed; that having rendered fervices to Don Lescar, and, at last, assisted him in making his escape, the closest intimacy had existed between them, and that he was considered as the most daring and enterprizing of all the pirates. Not being able to gain any farther information, the Colonel fecured the letters and picture, and embarked for the Isle of Providence. After five days fail they arrived there, and were received with universal joy by the Governor and the whole done with borrow out but sourge vittifland, who, alarmed at an absence so much longer that was expected, began to sear both the Colonel and the Count d'Oresty had fallen victims to the sury of Don Lescar; but their friends were returned, and all sorrow was banished.

The arrival of the Colonel with his suite, and the news of the victory, was celebrated with universal demonstrations of joy; the brave soldiers who fought under him were generously recompensed, as well as the six Verradians who had been instrumental to the victory. The three hundred prisoners taken at St. Verrado were sent to the Governor of the Spanish island of St. Domingo, as also a particular account of the expedition.

Sir James Corpley, who was fond of splendid entertainments, gave one at which the soldiers who were sent on the expedition to St. Verrado, and the unfortunate persons released from its prisons were present; nor could a sight more interesting

Count the ver

agers

agers I

re

he

th

del

pir

the

he 1

ed b

Ifles

d'O

Pete

from

lettle.

returi

nor a

under

W

of. thai and

resting be conceived than this social union of the heroes and the unfortunate persons delivered by was expedted, began to fear both the Color right

The Reader will recollect that the vessel which delivered Colonel Carlton from the hands of the pirates bore letters of recall to the Governor of the Isle of Providence. As soon, therefore, as he had fettled the affairs of the island, as appointed by Government, he embarked for the British Isles, accompanied by Colonel Carlton, the Count d'Oresty, Eleanor and Ambrose, and the faithful Peter. With respect to the prisoners released from the dungeons of St. Verrado, some of them settled in the Island of Providence, and the rest returned to their different countries.

What now could exceed the happiness of Eleanor and Ambrose! returning to their country under the conduct of their dear protector and the Count d'Oresty. The weather was favourable; the vessel arrived happily in port, and our voyagers being furnished with cloaths and every thing necessary to make their appearance as natives

oldiers ecomno had three fury

rned,

, and

uni-

st. Doe expe-

re sent

Splendid foldiers Verrado, a its prire interesting

mis to the heart of the Colonel tives in England, fet out post for the metropolis. It is not easy to form a just idea of the sensations of Colonel Carlton upon his arrival in a country which he had not feen for more than twelve years, and which contained treasures, to him, of inestimable value. The different revolutions that might have occurred in fo long a space of time naturally presented themselves to his mind, and alternately agitated him with hope and fear: he had left a wife and child whom he tenderly loved but death might long fince have configned them to the grave; or a fecond marriage, upon the fupposition of his death, might have embittered the remainder of his days. As he drew near London his fears encreased, and while every one was elate with joy and gladness, he was melancholy and dejected. Upon his arrival, he went immediately to the house of a relation, where he was informed that fince his supposed death, Mrs. Carlton had retired to a villa a few miles from the metropolis, where, with her fon, she lived wholly feeluded from the great world. How grateful wa by limin ever hour

while neces

aligh

frien tance from

hope

nound,

notwi

that the

quain as the

an inte

thi

this to the heart of the Coloner! Accompanied by his two pupils and the Count d'Oresty, he immediately fet out for the village, and towards evening arrived at an inn about a mile from the house where Mrs. Carlton refided. alighted and remained with Ambrose and Eleanor while the Count d'Oresty took upon himself the necessary office of preparing Mrs. Carlton for his reception. He introduced himself to her as a friend of the Colonel's, and mentioned at a diftance a report of a few having been preferved from the wreck; then having inspired her with hope, he ventured to tell her that letters had been received from some of the crew; but when he announced the certainty of her husband's fafety, and, at last, that he was actually in England, melannotwithstanding the caution with which it had he went been revealed, her furprize and joy were fo great, where he that the Count did not think it prudent to acth, Mrs. quaint her he was fo near, but contented himfelf, from the as the day was far advanced, with promising her an interview the next morning. The description LLOW GRAICHLL W.

thi

ed wholly

lis.

ons

ntry

ars,

efti-

that time

, and

r: he loved

them

ne fup-

ittered

w near

ery one

teful was

he gave the Colonel, on his return to the inn, of his Lady's emotions on the unexpected news of his arrival, afforded him heart-felt pleasure.

The next morning early, the whole group was affembled at the mansion of Mrs. Carlton, who was already up, and, with her fon, a promising youth of fixteen, impatiently awaiting the arrival The meeting was too affecting of her husband. to admit of description: the Colonel alternately pressed to his bosom his wife and son, and in the excess of happiness he enjoyed, forgot the years of anguish that were passed, or remembered them only to heighten his present joy. The first transports of meeting being over, the Colonel presented Eleanor and Ambrose to his Lady, telling her with a fmile, they were his adopted children, and that he hoped and trusted she would not find them undeferving her protection. The esteem of the Colonel was a sufficient recommendation to Mrs. Carlton; though unacquainted with their story, she cordially embraced, and presented them to her son Charles, who affured

his ther

of N

gent

been

her e happ

Their

to his

were

Carlto templ

counte

all pre

his

his father he should from that moment consider of s of

was
who ifing
rival ching nately
n the years

olonel
y, teldopted
would

bered

The recomquainted, and

his

them as his brother and fifter. In her turn, Mrs. Carlton introduced to the Colonel, by the name of Millar, a worthy clergyman, who had undertaken the care of their son's education, as also a gentlewoman, about the age of thirty-five, as the companion of her widowed hours. "Had it not been for my worthy friend," said she, "I must have sunk under the weight of my affliction; but her example taught me fortitude and resignation; I looked for consolation to religion, and to a happy eternity, for the selicity I despaired of tasting here."

The joy of Eleanor and Ambrose, on seeing their generous protector thus happily re-united to his family, was such as might be expected from the susceptibility of their hearts: their eyes were alternately fixed upon the Colonel, Mrs. Carlton, and Charles, never wearied with contemplating the happiness that was expressed in the countenance of each. The Count d'Oresty, and all present, shared in the general joy; and it was not, perhaps, possible to find a happier group than that affembled at the breakfast-table of Mrs. Carlton. The adventures of the Colonel, at length, became the topic of conversation, and at the request of his Lady and friends, he recounted the principal events that had occurred fince he left England; he mentioned his shipwreck on the uninhabited island, his discovery of Eleanor and Ambrose, and did not forget the many little incicidents that occurred to illustrate the goodness and fimplicity of their hearts. This part of his narrative feemed to make a fingular impression on the Lady, whom Mrs. Carlton had introduced as her companion and friend during the absence of her husband; she lost not a word, and more than once her eyes were observed to be dim with tears; but when the name of Derley was mentioned, allowing her countenance underwent a total alteration; Eleano she grew pale, and casting her eyes round with a observe wildness that alarmed every one present, request- fore ftr ed to see the letter and box found upon him. he bou The Colonel produced them; and the stranger phtain immediately im fel haf and but felv the,

not

ing from the r

" it

for w while the ft

gled to the the han Ars. . at nd at inted e left the r and inciodness of his fion on sced as nce of immediately exclaimed, "My children!" and fell back senseles in her chair. All arose in hafte to give the necessary assistance; she revived; and Eleanor and Ambrose, no longer doubting but they had found their mother, threw themselves on their knees before her: "Yes," said she, bending on them an eye of tender scrutiny, "it is my Eleanor-my Ambrose too! the living image of his lamented father; my heart, from the first moment I beheld him, pointed out the refemblance; but could I think!"-and here the stopped, overcome with fensations too great for words to express. Ambrose and Eleanor, while alternately embraced by their mother, minore than gled tears of gratitude and affection with those tears; the shed over them. The striking resemblance ntioned, (allowing for the difference of years) between eration; Eleanor and her mother, was now univerfally d with a observed, and every one wondered it had not berequest- fore struck him; yet an event so far exceeding on him. the bounds of human probability, could scarcely stranger obtain credit from any, excepting Mrs. Carlton, mediately who,

who, being acquainted with the story of her friend, entertained no doubt but that Providence had re-united her to her children. To remove every doubt, the Colonel produced the letters and picture he had found in the house of George Blake; these were immediately known by Mrs. Carlton's friend, who being sufficiently recovered, satisfied the company, by relating the particulars of her history. Her words were as sollow.

was descended from an ancient family, but inherited only a small patrimony; he had served many campaigns, but soon after the death of my mother, retired from the army in disgust upon a small annuity; this, from the embarrassments of the person in whose hands it was placed, after a see years ceased, and my father, at an advanced age, found himself reduced to a poverty, his high spirit was ill formed to brook.

"Our support depended chiefly upon a young man, an orphan, whom my father in happier days forgi affec fathe Derl induf my n want. ley, late, count who v that h this ac turnin ployed Breet,

ung upon ob

tears,

myfelf

to you

days

days had brought up and placed with a jeweller forgive the tear I shed to his memory; to me his affection was that of the kindest brother; to my father, of the most duteous and affectionate fon: Derley shared with us the pittance he obtained by industry, which, joined to the little I gained from my needle, preserved us from the extremities of want. But greater distress soon followed; Derley, from a variety of incidents too tedious to relate, and some debts he had contracted on our account, was thrown into prison, and my father. who was reduced by a long illness, grew so bad, that his life was despaired of. Overwhelmed by this accumulated diffress, I was one evening returning with some work from a shop that employed me, when, in passing through a retired freet, I could not forbear giving vent to my tears, which in the presence of my father I felt myself obliged to suppress; but I cannot describe to you how much I was humbled and confused. upon observing that my grief had drawn upon me the notice of a young man, who, as I afterward found, K 2

ce

nd rge

ve

Irs.

ow.

inhemany mo-

pon 2

fter a

ranced is high

young

happier

days

found, had for some time followed me. He addreffed me in the most respectful terms, and enquired into the cause of my grief, adding, "Do not suppose that any other motive than concern for the unfortunate prompts my curiofity; perhaps I may alleviate your distress. I replied, that my grief was not of a nature for him to alleviate, and that the only favour he could do me was to fuffer me to pass unnoticed. Saying this, I quickened my pace; but the stranger still following urged me, though in terms of great delicacy, to accept his friendship, at the same time offering me his purse. Great as our distress was, I was not yet fufficiently humbled to accept of pecuniary relief from a stranger; nor, indeed, would prudence have permitted it: I returned the thanks due to his generofity, but refused to accept any thing, and being arrived at our own door, wished him a good night. Upon entering, I found that an alarming change had taken place in my dear father, who furvived only till the next evening You who have hearts alive to the feelings of humanity ma my gre bir you abf con the pec pen fron to c as m mut fecte to th turni folati more

mean

that a

lity h

manity can better imagine than I can describe my fituation: deprived of a father whom I regretted, not only as the parent who had given me birth, but as the friend who had guided my youth; Derley, my only remaining friend, absent, languishing in a prison, unable either to confole or advise me! I was overwhelmed with the weight of these afflictions, when the unexpected entrance of Derley, for a moment, fufpended my grief; my heart gathered strength from the presence of my best friend, and I arose to communicate, in terms of as much gentleness as my own grief would permit, the loss we had mutually fustained. Derley was shocked and affected to tears; for some moments he gave vent to the emotions of his grateful heart, and then turning to me, endeavoured to give me the confolation he himself wanted: at length we became more calm, and I enquired by what unexpected means he had obtained his release? He replied that a generous stranger, of whose name and quality he was ignorant, had by some means gained intelli-

dn-Do

ern er-

hat ate,

s to

ickwing

7, to ering

was

cuniwould

hanks

t any wished

ad that

y dear

vening. of humanity

intelligence of his misfortunes, paid the debt, and enclosed for him a bank-note of ten pounds. The idea of the stranger who had accosted me the preceding evening, immediately rushed upon my mind; I communicated to Derley what had passed between us, and he agreed with me that it might be the same, though we were at a loss to conceive how he had gained the knowledge of our situation.

"Having performed the last melancholy duties to my dear father's remains, I began to think of looking out for a situation in which I might provide for my own subsistence, sensible that I could not long with propriety remain under the protection of Derley. About a week after the suneral of my father, the generous stranger introduced himself to Derley, as a friend willing to render him any farther services his situation might require: I was present, and knowing him to be the same that had accosted me, could not do less than express myself obliged by his civilities. Upon enquiring, we learnt that he had obtained a know-ledge hou ten De was den tent You to h our

d'Or

turne furpi felf to brofe at the on, fi feque and fe his fa

ledge of our fituation from the woman in whose house we lodged. From this time he called often, and his visits at last became so frequent, that Derley, the watchful guardian of my youth, was alarmed, and would absolutely have forbidden them, had not the stranger, foreseeing his intentions, professed his views to be honourable. Young and inexperienced, I too readily listened to his addresses, thoughtless of the obstacles that must attend our union, for we soon learnt that our benefactor was the only fon of the Count d'Oresty, the Ambassador from France."

The Colonel and his pupils at this moment turned their eyes upon their venerable friend with furprize and enquiry; nor was the Count himfelf unmoved. The mother of Eleanor and Ambrose stopped—but the Count looking significantly at the rest, and making a sign that she should go on, she continued. "Thoughtless of the consequences, instead of restraining my inclinations, and fetting before M. d'Oresty the duties he owed his father, and the evils that must attend his disobedience,

n ennow-

n ex-

t,

S.

he

ny

if-

it

to

of

ties

cof

vide

not

tion

1 of

im-

him

ire:

fame

ledge

obedience, I listened to his addresses, and confented to a private marriage, foolishly amusing myfelf with the hope that he would find means to reconcile his father to the imprudent step he had taken. A house was hired in a retired part of the town, and we lived together in mutual harmony; but happiness was far from being our guest; the idea of the troubles in which I was fenfible I must involve my husband, should his father, who I now understood inherited all the pride of high birth and defigned him for another, prove inflexible, continually alarmed, and made me wretched. These reflections, which I ought to have made before it had been too late, undermined my peace, though they did not repair my errors. A few months after our marriage, I observed a gloom on the countenance of my husband, and enquiring the cause, he told me that his father, having learnt that a connexion existed between us, had declared that if it tended to marriage, he would certainly difinherit him. This entirely frustrated his design of disclosing his marriage, which af an ela aw wi den to Fr fan gui my huf fatl

W

to

app

me.

upo

he c

of i

diat

which he now thought it necessary more closely to conceal: our refidence was changed, and foon after I brought into the world twins; my Eleanor and Ambrose were born. More than three years elapsed, and all suspicion of our union had died away when my husband one evening returned with the dreadful tidings that his father had ordered him to embark in a few weeks for France, to forward his nuptials with the daughter of the French minister, for whom he had from his infancy been defigned. I need not tell you the anguish this communicated to my heart, nor was my poor d'Oresty less affected: I wept, and my husband, who well knew the inflexibility of his father, had scarcely a word of consolation to offer me. We parted that evening without refolving upon any thing, but the next, he met me with the appearance at least of more serenity; he told me that finding it impossible without the utter ruin of us all to discover his marriage to his father, he could think of no way but to embark immediately for South-Carolina, and folicit the intern us, e, he tirely riage, which

0

d

of

rur

as

his

the

ier,

ade

t to

ned

OTS.

ed a

and ther,

K 5

ference

ference of an uncle who relided there, and who had great influence with his father. The tender age of my children made me alive to all the perils and fatigues they must encounter; I represented these to M. d'Oresty, and endeavoured to dissuade him from the voyage, especially as I conceived the interference of his uncle might be equally as well obtained by letter; but poor d'Oresty thought otherwise; he imagined that his uncle, and every one must see with the eyes he did, and thought the presence of his wife and children would plead more powerfully than volumes. His first design was to embark with us, but the difficulty he found in disengaging himself, without creating suspicions which he wished to avoid, made him relinquish the idea, and it was determined that I should embark with the children and Derley, and await his arrival at Charles-Town. Finding that his heart was fet upon the voyage, I submitted, and in less than three weeks fet out under the conduct of Derley, with the children and a female fervant, for Plymouth, from whence we

le I

le

va inr thi of he but the atte filer ger. I ob guft whe for r pride he, v offer

were

were to embark with the first fair wind. The letter you found in the pocket of poor Derley I received from my husband the day before we left London.

2

d

IS

nt

ry

he ad

gn

ind

pi-

in-

at I

and

ding

Sub-

nder

ind a

e wc

were

MOVE

"As the winds were contrary, upon our arrival at Plymouth, we took up our residence at the inn, where we remained above a week; during this time we had frequent visits from the Captain of the vessel in which we were to sail; indeed. he intruded oftener than was agreeable to me, but attributing all to his wish of obliging, and the partiality of a mother being flattered by the attention he paid the children, I passed it over in filence and embarked without fuspicion of danger. We had not been many days at fea before I observed a familiarity in his manners that difgusted me; but judge what was my indignation when he had the prefumption to profess a passion. for me. I retorted in the language my wounded pride dictated and the infult deferved; to which he, with the utmost coolness returned "that the offer of his hand, which he freely made me could not be construed into an infult, especially as I must consider that he was sole master in the vesfel, and confequently that I was in his power." I now faw the villain I had to deal with, and profitting by the hint that I was in his power, I endeavoured to remonstrate with less hauteur, reprefenting to him, that being already the wife of another, I could not liften to his propofals, however honourable or advantageous they might be." I had no fooner faid this, than he drew from his pocket a letter, and putting it, with a farcastic fmile into my hand, told me that I should see he wished to exact nothing inconsistent with the first rules of honour. My eye glanced upon the fuperscription, which I immediately knew to be the hand-writing of my hufband: I opened the letter trembling, and read these terrible words.

Derley

"MY DEAR ELEANOR,

descript books again the supplied and to another

"

that my

mi last

tha

of of the lend

med

Lon of n

perf

&quot;All our plans are frustrated—I am mortally wounded—if this meets you, lose not a moment—set off instantly for London, (the bearer will

"will conduct you) that I may have the fatisfaction of leaving you under the protection of my father.—There is no time to dissemble. God Managarahat dir Assarthanian to hamove how

" grant you may not arrive too late."

d

I

e-

of

V-

**

nis

fic

he

the

the

be

the

ls.

TER I

tally

mo-

earer

will

D'ORESTY.

I will not attempt to describe what I felt upon reading this letter; my anguish arose to a pitch that bordered upon madness. When I cast my eyes round, and faw myfelf shut out from the possibility of flying to my husband, and learnt, that had it not been for the blackest treachery, I might have arrived time enough to have taken a last farewell of him; for Blake made no scruple of confessing, that though I was on board when the messenger arrived, we had not weighed anchor, attributing what he had done to the violence of his passion, as he understood from the messenger whom he had accosted upon the beech, that it contained an express for me to return to London. For some hours I actually lost the use of my reason, which so alarmed the wretch who persecuted me, that he left me to the care of

Derley,

Derley, who in vain strove to foothe and reconcile me to my misfortunes. Time, however, and the tender cares of a mother, affected what argument could not; my reason returned, and the innocent prattle of my children diverted my thoughts from a calamity, the recollection of which drove me almost to phrenzy; but I had more yet to endure. I was again persecuted by the odious addresses of Blake, from which Derley in vain endeavoured to defend me. He grew impatient, and to intreaties added threats of the most horrid nature. Alarmed at my fituation, I endeavoured to diffemble, thinking, that when we arrived at Charles-Town, the place to which the vessel was bound, I should easily rid myself of his importunities. He, however, more skilled in artifice than I was, saw through my drift, and finding that Derley would ever remain an obstacle to his views, he resolved to be rid of him at the first opportunity: nor was this all; my innocent children became the objects of his detestation, from the supposition, I conclude, that they kept alive sed W lea fce abo fitt the De into mir paid on, ed i ther was of b men Blak stabl the i

and :

notw

deav

in

in

t

t

n

e

e.

of

ed

n-

e.

if-

at ras

tu-

ice

ing

his

op-

hil-

om

live

in

in my heart the remembrance of their father; at least I can assign no other reason for the dreadful scene I am going to relate. We had been at sea about feven weeks, when one morning as I was fitting with my children, one on one knee, and the other on the other, weeping, and talking with Derley on the events that were past, Blake came into the cabin: he renewed the usual theme, mingling threats with promises, till finding I paid no attention to his discourse, but still wept on, and embraced my children, he fuddenly started up, and fnatching them from my arms, threw them with violence on the ground. Derley, who was attached to the children, incenfed at this act of brutality, yielding to the impulse of the moment, feized him by the throat; an affront which Blake revenged by drawing a short sword, and stabbing him, as I thought, to the heart. At the the instant, five or fix men came into the cabin, and at a fignal given, feized Derley, while others, notwithstanding my prayers, tears, and frantic endeavours to prevent it, bore away the children What

20

What were all my former troubles to the anguish of this moment! I fancied I heard the cries of my children under the hands of their murderers, yet was unable to fly to their rescue; I endeavoured to force the door of the cabin, but finding my efforts vain, I funk down infensible, and remember no more till I found myfelf on my bed, my fervant fitting by me. I called aloud for my children, my Ambrose-my Eleanor, and was in vain affured that they were in fafety—that they were left with Derley on an island we had coasted; I gave no credit to the tale, believing it fabricated merely to amuse me, especially as I found my servant was in the interest of Blake. I will not trouble you with all I fuffered during the voyage; fuffice it to fay, that we arrived at Charles-Town, where I hoped to escape the tyranny of my persecutor, but I was mistaken; under the pretence that I was his niece, and deranged in my intellects, he conveyed me to his house, and committed me to the care of my treacherous fervant, whom he had fuborned to his inte-

the horizontal lates of

pa

ing

ftor the fuff whi

ban bili

cea

Was

riva my

1 reft.

ifh

of

rs.

ea-

nd-

and

my

for

and

that had

ng it as I

e. I

iring

ed at

e ty-

ken;

eran-

ouse,

ache-

inte-

reft.

rest. Six months I was closely confined, but at the end of that time, through the assistance of an honest labourer who worked in grounds adjacent, I effected my escape, and having fortunately concealed about my person bank notes to the amount of a hundred and sifty pounds, engaged for my passage in a vessel that was on the point of sailing for England.

"You will, perhaps, think that my first step ought to have been that of communicating my story to the magistrates of the town, and claiming their protection; but if you knew what I had suffered, how much my spirits were depressed, and what reason I had to dread the machinations of the wretch by whom I was persecuted, you will cease to wonder at my conduct. My sole object was to return to England, either to meet my husband, (which seemed within the bounds of possibility) or to die there in obscurity.

With these ideas I embarked; but on my arrival soon learnt, as I had reason to presage, that my husband was no more. He expired, as far as I could judge from the vague information I collected, a few hours after the messenger was dispatched to me; even before the arrival of his father, who set off for Bath on the morning on which the duel was fought. I learnt also, that the Count d'Oresty, in consequence of his affliction, had solicited his recall, and had returned to France a sew weeks after the death of his son.

end, and I refolved, in some quiet family, to seek an humble establishment, where I could perform the duties of my station, and prepare for the quitting of a world which had for me no longer any charms. The person at whose house I lodged, understanding my intention, mentioned a lady, who she said was on the point of retiring into the country, and wanted a person capable of being a companion, and at the same time of assisting in the management of her samily. Need I say that it was my dear Mrs. Carlton? I was introduced to her and immediately engaged. In due time I related to her my unhappy story, and experienced affing my fer according ami

he

lity prof dera

not

lies risin Hear

port

I

ſ-

1-

n

at

C-

to

an

ek

rm

the

ger

dg-

dy,

the

ng a

g in that

aced

me I

nced

her

her generous sympathy: The treated me with the affection of a fifter, and could I have forgotten my children-my husband-my friend-torn from me by the most perverse and cruel destiny, I might have been happy. She pressed me to make myself known to the family of my husband, offered me money for the purpose, nay would have accompanied me to France; but I declined her generous offers; I knew not whether the father of my husband was acquainted with his indiscretions, and as I had not children to prompt my ambition, or to call forth my exertions, I wished not to fully his memory with the revival of follies which originated only in his too great partiality for me. Twelve years have passed, not unprofitably away; religion has taught me to moderate both my griefs and my refentment, and reconciled me to a life which I once thought infupportable."

Here Madam d'Oresty ceased—and the Count, rising from his seat, looked with reverence toward Heaven, and exclaimed, "Wonderful are thy works.

works, Oh God, and thy ways past finding out." Then taking Madam d'Oresty by the hand, "What a train of interesting events," said he, " have you unfolded! In me behold the father of " your husband; in me, my children," turning to Ambrose and Eleanor," " behold your grandsire."

The Colonel, his pupils, and indeed the company in general, had been prepared by the aspect and gestures of the Count, to expect something extraordinary; but Madam d'Oresty, absorbed in the recital of her calamities, and commanding only a fide view of him from the feat she occupied, heard this declaration with inexpressible wonder. She viewed the Count a moment in filent aftonishment; but soon recollecting the character in which she stood before him, she covered her face with her hands, and bending forward, feemed to await the reproaches she considered due to her from the father of her husband.

The Count was affected by this interesting attitude, too expressive to be misunderstood, and taking her hand, affured her he should henceforth for fon app per nor the fano vite thor lose erro cove to h you, clina of m years T brose

grati

imple

f

0 n-

a

ng

in

ing

ied,

der.

afto-

er in face

ed to o her

ng at-

l, and

hence-

forth

forth consider her not only as the widow of his fon, but as the daughter of his affection. "You appear, faid he, "too fensible of your errors to permit me to animadvert upon them; we have none of us been blameless; myself not the least; the referve and feverity with which, from his infancy I treated my fon, repulfed rather than invited the confidence of friendship, while the authority I affumed over his inclinations made him lose the respect due to me as a parent; but his errors have been fignally punished; let the grave cover them, and may they prove a useful lesson to his children. Early my dear Ambrose, and you, my sweet Eleanor, learn to restrain your inclinations, and to keep them within the bounds of moderation; remember, my children, that the gratification of a moment may be followed by years of anxiety and pain."

The Count then embraced Eleanor and Ambrose, who threw themselves upon their knees to implore his blessing. The conversation then turning upon past events, the Count confirmed what Madam d'Oresty had heard concerning the death of her husband. "I unfortunately," faid he, " fet out for Bath the morning on which the fatal duel was fought; an express was dispatched for me, but before I arrived my fon had breathed his last. I will not attempt to describe my grief; he was my only child, and Heaven is witness how dear! The country became hateful to me; I folicited my recall, and returned to France, It happened foon after that I had letters from Cuba, acquainting me with the death of an old friend, who had left me his possessions there: I prepared for the voyage, thinking an entire change of objects might diffipate the melancholy which fince the death of my fon had taken possesfion of my foul. I arrived, and remained there fome months, when Blake, as the Colonel has before related, descended upon the island, and bore me, among the number affembled in his veffel, to St. Verrado." Here the Count ceased, bins an the Colonel and his family were the

ing

affoag

th

a

en Ti

pro

and

OV

ed i

Ele:

fal v

Cour

certa

clain

told t

and joined with every one present in admiring the wonderful chain of events by which Providence had united them.

,

d

d

f;

fs

e ;

ce.

om

old

: I

tire

noly

ffef-

here

l has

and

s vef

eafed,

and

The Count had passed about a week at the mansion of his friend, when he began to think of embarking for France, to fee after his estates. The prospect of so early a separation cast a gloom over the whole party; but when the Colonel proposed to his Lady a trip to the continent, chearfulness was univerfally restored. Charles and Ambrose, between whom a friendship founded upon mutual virtues had already taken place, looked at each other and smiled, while the eyes of Eleanor met those of her mother and Mrs. Carlton sparkling with pleasure: in short, the propofal was univerfally relished, and in less than a month they all embarked for France. The Count upon arriving found that his estates still remained in the hands of his agent; for as no certain tidings of his death had transpired, no claim had been made. The Reader need not be told that the Colonel and his family were the guefts guests of the Count d'Oresty; during three months which their visit continued, he spared no polite and friendly attention to render it agreeable; they made an excursion to Paris, from which the Count's feat was a few leagues distant, and were gratified with the view of every thing that celebrated city contained deferving the attention of the curious. They visited the Louvre, the Thuilleries, the Palace of Orleans, celebrated for its valuable collection of paintings, and the Gobelines, a famous manufactory of tapestry, which takes its name from one Goblie, a noted dyer of Reims, who lived in the reign of Francis the First. Ambrose and Eleanor were interested in every thing they faw; the perfection to which the arts had arisen struck them with wonder and delight; for though acquainted with the principles of each, they had formed no idea of the . powerful effects produced by them when applied by genius and industry: in the mean while, they conciliated the affection of their mother and grandfather by a thousand instances of their doci-

lity

di

te

E

en

COI

kin

The

tud

war

atta

of I

his

lity and the goodness of their hearts; the Count became daily more attached to them, and they in return omitted nothing that might express their gratitude and affection. After three months spent in the pleasures of social intercourse, the Colonel prepared to return with his family to England, when an unexpected event retarded his departure, and plunged every one in the deepest forrow. This was the death of the Count d'Oresty, who was feized with a complaint of which he died in three days. His lofs was fincerely regretted by every one, but especially by Ambrose and Eleanor, who had flattered themselves with long enjoying his paternal care, and shewing by their couduct the grateful sense they entertained of his kindness. Nor was Madam d'Oresty less affected; the regretted him with all the warmth of gratitude and friendship his generous conduct toward her and her children merited; indeed his attachment to them was manifested to the last act of his life; for being alarmed at the symptoms of his disorder, he sent for a notary and in the prefence

lity

e

10

e-

m

nt,

ng

at-

re,

ted

the

try,

oted

ncis

fled

hich

and

orin-

the

ap-

vhile,

er and

doci-

16

will, in which he nominated Ambrose his heir, and provided amply for Eleanor and her mother: but this acquisition of independence, far from mitigating, encreased the grief they felt for the loss of their friend, by adding another to the proofs they had already received of his friendship and affection.

As the Colonel was nominated executor to the Count's will, as also guardian to Eleanor and Ambrose, his presence was necessary to arrange their affairs; he remained, therefore, some time longer in France, till having settled every thing to his satisfaction, he embarked for Englaand, accompanied by Madam d'Oresty and his pupils, who joyfully accepted the invitation he gave of passing the ensuing Winter in England. After a pleasant voyage they arrived; and in the society of their friends began to resume their wonted chearfulness, when an event the most distressing and unexpected turned all their joy to the bitterest anguish. The Reader must recollect that

Sir

S

ai

ho

de

in

CI

Ca

in

dat

Sp

fati

neg

fett

Con

an

fom

Col

inve

with

he co

Sir James Corpley had fent the prisoners taken at St. Verrado to the Governor of the Spanish illand St. Domingo, with an account of the expedition, and his reasons for undertaking it: these reasons, however, did not fatisfy the Court of Spain; the destruction of the Colony was construed into any infringement upon the rights of the Spanish Crown, and remonstrances made to the British Cabinet. The inhabitants of St. Verrado were in vain represented as a banditti, to whose depredations all Europe was subject; the honour of the Spanish Court was thought to be concerned, and satisfaction demanded. In short, after various negotiations between the Courts, it was at last fettled to punish the aggressors, viz. Sir James Corpley and the Colonel, with exile. This was an unexpected stroke: the joy which had for some months before enlivened the mansion of the Colonel was no more. Eleanor wept; Ambrose inveighed loudly against the sentence, which, notwithstanding the representations of the Colonel, he could not help thinking unjust, and both declared

L 2

Sir

2

S

fs

nd

0

the

and

nge

ime

hing

and,

mils,

ve of

fter a

ociety

vonted

reffing

he bit-

A that with that of their friends, the Colonel thought clared they would follow their protector to the end of the earth. Madam d'Oresty said the same to her friend Mrs. Carlton, who felt rather on her husband's than her own account, observing that it was of little importance what country she inhabited, if she had the society of her busband, fon, and friend. "Ah," faid Eleanor, "would to Heaven we were all together in our isle!" This exclamation, uttered without design, gave birth to an idea in the mind of the Colonel, which foon-became the favourite topic of conversation: this was no other than the founding of a colony in the island which had fo long ferved him and his pupils as a retreat. He mentioned it to Sir James Corpley who immediately entered into it, and pointed out the probability of Government approving and encouraging fuch a plan; in short, they united their interests, obtained the permisfion and encouragement they defired, and began to arrange every thing for the founding of a new colony. Madam d'Oresty and her children still expressing their resolution of joining their fate

Pete hun

t

C

g

uj

in cla

of

fhe

wi

par

Mr

chil

follo

The The

with

with that of their friends, the Colonel thought proper to fet before them the advantages they would forego by quitting a civilized country, where every enjoyment affluence could purchase awaited them, for one unfrequented, in which they must wait some years, at least, even for the conveniences of life; he said all that the most generous and disinterested mind could dictate upon the subject, but Madam d'Oresty, to the inexpressible joy of Ambrose and Eleanor, declared, that as it coincided with the inclinations of her children, her resolution was fixed, and that she had no higher ambition than to live and die with her friend.

In about fix months all was ready for their departure, and Sir James Corpley, the Colonel, Mrs. Carlton, Charles, Madam d'Oresty, her children, the worthy Mr. Millar, and honest Peter, embarked at Portsmouth, with about six hundred persons, men and women, who willingly sollowed as settlers in the new Government. The voyage was favourable; after a few weeks fail

g

le

d, ld

rth ich on:

ony

mes

hort,

began a new n still

with

fail they drew near the Antilles, and Ambrose and Eleanor began to fearch with wishful eyes for the island which had been the afylum of their youth: at length, the veffel directing its courfe eastward of Jamaica, they discerned from far the point of a rock which feemed familiar to them: the vessel approaches: it is the same; it is their beloved ifle. They behold the melancholy veftiges of the forest destroyed by the conflagration; the shore where they had fabricated the little bark in which alone and unprotected they had tempted the dangers of the fea: they land, and feel a thoufand pleasing sensations on finding themselves again in an island in which, though they had experienced fome painful moments, they had paffed years of peace and tranquility. Every fpot is vifited; the place where their cabin stood; the cavern in which Derley expired; the grot where honest Peter was preserved; nor will it be asked if they visited the little mount covered with myrrh trees; they are already with their mother at the foot of the monument erected with their own hands

ti

li

fo

an

go

rat

and

enj

Eng

Col

of t

Twi

dren

Hea

Colo

hands to the memory of Derley, shedding with

In a short time the ground is cleared, and broken up; buildings arise; fortifications, even a port issues from the hands of the new colonists, and in less than four years they had shelter, cultivated fields, in a word, all the conveniences of life. Sir James Corpley and the Colonel, who were nominated joint Governors, in conjunction formed a code of laws, which were tendered to, and univerfally approved by the people; they governed the Colony with that justice and moderation which formed the basis of their character; and the fame of their wisdom, and of the happiness enjoyed under their administration foon reaching England, they had the pleasure of seeing the new Colony daily encrease, and at length become one of the most flourishing; it was called the Isle of Twins, in memory of the desertion of the children, and the fignal protection afforded them by Heaven. Not long after the arrival of the new Colonists, some Carribes, according to their usual custom, fe or eir

rfé the

heir

m:

iges the

d the

felves

paffed

is vi-

he cawhere

e asked myrrh

er at the

hands

custom, landed on the island: at the fight of the Europeans they embarked precipitately in their canoes, but the Colonel wishing to put some questions to them, ordered several to be detained: the account they gave of their expedition into the island; once in three years, was nearly the same as that given by Peter; but they added, they often flayed feveral days in the island, during which they planted maize and other grain, in the hope of finding it multiplied at their next visit. This fingular custom explained to the Colonel what he had till now confidered as a mystery, viz. the finding, on his first arrival in the island, entire plains of maize and a variety of vegetable productions, which required the pains of culture, and confequently not to be expected in an uninhabited land: but to return. A few years after their arrival in the island, the Colonel and Mrs. Carlton had the fatisfaction of feeing their fon Charles united to Eleanor; and foon after Ambrose made choice of a young lady, the niece of Sir James Corpley, univerfally esteemed for her amiable

20

t(

fh

CO

the

rac

qu

for

titu

and

lool

FOMASIS CHA SPORENS

miable disposition and personal accomplish-Honest Peter enjoyed the tranquility his ments. years required and his fervices merited; he died at an advanced age, a few years after their arrival in the island, and was buried at the side of Derley, to whose memory a superb monument was erected. The worthy Mr. Millar lived univerfally respected, and by his virtues did honour to the religion he professed and maintained in the Colony. Madame d'Oresty and her friend Mrs. Carlton had the pleasure of seeing their friendship perpetuated in their children, who, by their conduct, daily rendered themselves more worthy their affection. In fhort, all these worthy characters in this delightful retreat enjoyed the tranquility which is the refult only of virtue.

Ambrose and Eleanor through life entertained for their preceptor that tender respect and gratitude his conduct toward them justly merited, and their hearts were so well formed to pay: they looked up to him as to the parent who had fostered.

or her

e

ir

ne

d:

he

me

ten

ich

ope

his

t he

the

tire

pro-

ture,

min-

after

Mrs.

fon.

Am-

ece of

tered and to the friend who had guided their youth, ever bearing in remembrance, that the happiness they enjoyed in society was the fruit of those precepts they had imbibed from him in folitude. while ediann's train on in entire the FIP

THE END. And Y To not Buil

wanta an and a man of the austre

The Knight of thirtee and dide

Han V to not

proyement of the

scond fiduops

ERRATA.

Page 22, line 18, for there, read thefe. . Whish A. 48, - 13, for invefted, read reposed. 46, - 2, for or, read and.

ir ne of in 11 / HI 15 ing Titli T Auctorial

A.